it effect on New England and the western States. I would not have this Government converted into a despotism for its own sake. Moreover, I submit to the gentleman from Ohio and to all others, whether holding these States as provincial dependencies is the proper way to promote a sincere and general loyalty among their people. Something is due to human nature on that point as on every other. The lessons of history are full of warning and instruction upon it. Did Austria promote sincere loyalty by holding Italy and Hungary in subjection? No; disloyalty grew stronger and stronger with every day of her pressure, until finally she was forced to yield to it, in the one case by arms and in the other by concession, to save her own empire. And so it has been all through the world and all through history. Why, it seems to me that the dial of civilization must have gone backward two thousand years if we accept any such theory of national life and national conduct as this. Cannot we exercise as much clemency in this nineteenth century of the Christian era as Julius Cæsar exercised all through his civil wars in Rome? His first act, after he had crushed his great opponent Pompey in a struggle of life and death, was to admit every one of his followers to an amnesty; the first thing he generally did after conquering a neighboring State was to admit its people to the full rights and privileges of citizenship in Rome.

Sir, I will not pursue this theme, although it is full of interest and instruction. But if we cannot bring ourselves to act with magnanimity in dealing with a vanquished foe of our own race and country, if we cannot treat the southern people as members of this Union, admitting them to equal rights in this Republic, without degrading terms or doing aught to humiliate and destroy their pride and self-respect, then we may make up our minds that we are not equal to the crisis on which we have fallen. We shall fail in restoring peace, harmony, and prosperity to the Union. But the nation will not perish. Others will take our places who better appreciate the nature of the work that devolves upon us, and who will accomplish the end we fail to reach or even to comprehend. I think our danger here and now, lies in doing too much rather than too little. I think the relations of the Union are rapidly being restored. We must bear this in mind, that it does not depend altogether on our political action what shall be the future relations of the South with the North. Influences are at work to-day restoring friendly relations and harmony far more rapidly than any action we are likely to take can do. The great want of the southern people to-day is industry,—to repair their losses, to renew their agriculture, to replace their implements of labor, to find capital to cultivate their lands, to plant cotton, and to start into activity and life, everything that enters into the prosperity of a free people. Restored commerce, "trade, the calm health of nations," will do more for them and for us than any laws we can place upon our statute-book. It is our duty, our duty to ourselves as well as to them, to aid them in these endeavors to build themselves up again, for by so doing we do but build up ourselves. We should do what we can to promote their prosperity; for, in so doing, we but promote our own. If we cannot do this, then we are not equal to the task we have undertaken, and must give place, sooner or later, to those who are.

And now, sir, let me submit in succinct form what I think it would be well for this House and this Government to do; and submitting it simply as an expression of my own views, I shall leave the whole question to the judgment of the House.

In the first place, I think we ought to accept the present status of the southern States, and regard them as having resumed, under the President's guidance and action, their functions of self-government in the Union.

In the second place, I think this House should decide on the admission of Representatives by districts, admitting none but loyal men who can take the oath we may prescribe, and holding all others as disqualified; the Senate acting, at its discretion, in the same way in regard to representatives of States.

I think, in the third place, we should provide by law for giving to the freedmen of the South all the rights of citizens in courts of law and elsewhere.

In the fourth place, I would exclude from Federal office the leading actors in the conspiracy which led to the rebellion in every State.

In the fifth place, I would make such amendments to the Constitution as may seem wise to Congress and the States, acting freely and without coercion.

And sixth, I would take such measures and precautions by the disposition of military forces, as will preserve order and prevent the overthrow, by usurpation or otherwise, in any State, of its republican form of government.

And now, sir, I have only to thank the members of the House for the very great indulgence with which they have listened to my remarks. I may have erred in my opinions, for I have no overweening confidence in my own judgment on these high themes. But I can most truly say that I have spoken from a sincere desire to promote the peace and harmony of the Union we have preserved, and the permanent welfare of the country we have struggled so hard and so successfully to save. If I have said aught that is just and true, I beg that it may not be disparaged by anything I may have uttered that is untimely or unwise. Above all I beg this House to bear in mind, as the sentiment that should control and guide its action, that we of the North and they of the South are at war no longer. The gigantic contest is at an end. The courage and devotion on either side which made it so terrible and so long, no longer owe a divided duty, but have become the common property of the American name, the priceless possession of the American Republic through all time to come. The dead of the contending hosts sleep beneath the soil of a common country, and under one common flag. Their hostilities are hushed, and they are the dead of the nation forevermore. The victor may well exult in the victory he has achieved. Let it be our task, as it will be our highest glory, to make the vanquished, and their posterity to the latest generation, rejoice in their defeat.

Mr. JULIAN resumed the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to say one word, and that is if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] replies to the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] I shall call him to order. The whole speech of the gentleman from New York has been in violation of the rule making this joint resolution the special order. I did not think it proper to call him to order, but I shall call any gentleman to order who is an old member of the House if he follows his line of argument.

Mr. RAYMOND. I simply wish to reply to that rather personal remark—

Mr. STEVENS. Not at all personal.

Mr. RAYMOND. I was not aware that I was any more in violation of the rules of this House and of the proprieties of this debate than has been any other gentleman who has spoken upon this subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I know the gentleman was not aware of it, and therefore I did not call him to order.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of military reserve on St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION—AGAIN.

Mr. JULIAN then addressed the House. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. JULIAN yielded the remainder of his time (forty minutes) to Mr. CONKLING.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained leave to print a speech, which will appear in the Appendix.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the joint committee [Mr. STEVENS] when he proposes to demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I stated the other day that I intended to call the previous question to-day. If, however, the gentleman desires to speak to-day, I do not wish to do anything more than call the previous question when he shall have concluded. I do not desire to interrupt him in the middle of his speech.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not desire to speak to-day. I should be very glad to avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] to make, so far as I may be able, some answer to the objections which have been urged against the pending proposition. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows as well as I do that it would be quite idle for me to attempt, at this late hour, and in the present mood of the House, to go on with my remarks at the present time. I do not make this suggestion with a view to postpone the demand of the previous question; but if the previous question were not to be called until to-morrow, and I might then occupy the floor for a short time, I should be very glad. I wish, however, not to interfere at all with the design of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but to conform myself to it, and to relinquish the floor altogether or to go on in the morning, according to the convenience and judgment of the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I hardly know what to say. I do not desire to urge the gentleman to go on this evening, as it is late, and gentlemen all around me have said that they did not want the previous question called this evening. I do not know, sir, but that if we can agree by common consent to forego the morning hour to-morrow and go on with this discussion, I would be very willing not to call the previous question until half past one o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. This subject is a special order to the exclusion of all other business, and takes precedence of the morning hour. Therefore the debate, unless arrested by the previous question, will continue to-morrow during the morning hour.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say, then, that I will not ask the previous question until two o'clock to-morrow, if that will satisfy gentlemen who want to speak; but I think that that is the latest time that ought to be given.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed of three gentlemen who yet desire to speak, besides the gentleman who holds the floor. There may be others.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, as at present advised, I must call the previous question at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire, then, as to my right to the floor in the morning?

The SPEAKER. That will depend upon the action of the House. The gentleman has forty minutes remaining of the time of the gentleman from Indiana. If there is no objection, he will be considered as entitled to occupy the floor for that time in the morning.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOGAN. Before this question shall be disposed of, I should like to have the privilege of occupying perhaps thirty minutes of the time of the House. I should be glad to do so either before or after the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] No Representative from my State has, as yet, spoken on this subject; and as I am the only Democrat from that State, I would like to be heard on this important question. I should esteem it as a favor if the House would allow me the opportunity to make a few remarks.

Mr. STEVENS. Is the gentleman ready to go on this evening?

Mr. HOGAN. I have no objection to that, if it be the pleasure of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope, then, that the gentleman will be allowed to go on this evening, with the understanding that when he concludes the House shall adjourn.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to make a motion which I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] to accept as a substitute for his motion, now pending, as I understand. That motion, I believe, is to recommit this joint resolution with certain instructions. I desire him to accept as a substitute for his motion a motion to recommit without instructions, giving the committee authority to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has the power to accept an amendment, if he sees fit.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It will be time enough for that to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has been recognized to-day and may not be recognized to-morrow, but the gentleman from Ohio has the power to modify his own motion any time previous to the previous question being seconded.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask to make my motion now.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. In order that the subject may go to the committee unembarrassed, after the discussion we have had, I am willing to accept the proposition of the gentleman from New York simply to recommit. No injury can result from this course, for the reason that when the committee shall report, all these questions can come up then for our discussion and determination.

Mr. STEVENS. We can settle this to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. With this modification the instructions of the gentleman from Ohio and all other instructions fall.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am anxious to get a vote on my instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] has the floor, and, as has been often decided, he cannot yield for a motion to amend.

Mr. SCHENCK. I want to move, as an amendment to the pending motion, the instructions presented by me, and which were read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Have I the right to object?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I am under the necessity to object. I wish to say, in explanation of that objection, that my object is to get the question back to the committee, so that they may express their views and give a report in the light of the discussion which has taken place for the last few days.

I think that a majority of Congress is in favor of an amendment to the Constitution attaining the point sought by the pending resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not the gentleman willing that all the accompanying propositions shall be sent back to the committee?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Undoubtedly. That is the object I have in view. I have not the slightest objection to that.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] that, notwithstanding the discussion which has taken place, no man can tell us what is the sense of the House on any one proposition. I am willing it should go back without further discussion. I have learned many things, but I have not learned that any three men agree on any one proposition. Therefore if it goes to the committee we have nothing to guide us. There has been no indication of the disposition of the House. Let us have instructions so that we may know what is the sense of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose a motion to recommit with instructions is carried by a small majority, what of that when the amendment has to be carried by a two-thirds vote?

Mr. STEVENS. Those instructions the committee would obey with alacrity, as they would be bound to. As the thing now stands, with so many instructions offered, and a vote on none of them, we might as well try to get sense from the jargon of Babel.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am anxious to get my proposition before the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. Is this discussion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order. The gentleman has a right to yield for an explanation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make a motion to amend.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I make the point of order that the House cannot instruct a joint committee.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late; but the Chair will overrule the point of order. This House can instruct a joint committee. The Committee on Printing is a joint committee, and it is often instructed by the House. So with the Committee on the Library. But it instructs only so far as the House members are concerned. It does not bind the Senate.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to modify my resolution so that it shall take to the committee all pending propositions. My object is to get before the committee the result of this entire discussion so that they may consider it in the light of that discussion. I hope that the motion will be adopted at once. When the committee reports we can then take whatever final action we may please.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire whether that will carry the propositions which are now pending as amendments or in any other legitimate way before the House.

The SPEAKER. It would not carry all the propositions that have been printed; it would carry those that are pending as amendments to the joint resolution under consideration, including the one offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise for the purpose of submitting an amendment, having the permission of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to take so much of his time for that purpose. I propose to amend the motion of my colleague by referring the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary in lieu of the motion to recommit to the joint committee. This subject was before the Judiciary Committee, about to be reported, and all that they considered went by a side wind; very properly I suppose, because of its supposed connection with other propositions relating to the restoration of the States, and it was sent to this same committee on reconstruction.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will not say it was by a side wind; it was one of the subjects expressly committed to us by the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am perfectly aware of that, but it had been expressly committed to the Committee on the Judiciary before—this very subject. It is in order, I believe, to select from among the committees which had better take this subject of the amendment to the Constitution, and as the Committee on the Judiciary has always, in both branches of Congress, been the one to which amendments to the Constitution have been referred, I propose to amend by moving to refer it to that committee. I am in so doing, I believe, not only perfectly in order, but acting within the line of safe precedent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] can make that motion in lieu of the one he has offered, if he desires. The motion is in order, and will take priority over the other, the Committee on the Judiciary being a standing committee, and the other being a select one.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question then is on the motion to recommit to the committee on reconstruction, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] moves as an amendment to recommit without instruction, which will carry with it all the propositions pending on the subject.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I accept that amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. If it goes without instructions I see no kind of propriety in any further time being occupied in the House with discussion. If we can be permitted to do it the committee will consent that the motion be now taken on that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House by unanimous consent has granted to the gentleman from New York forty minutes to speak to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. I waive that. I agree that it is worse than idle to be discussing this proposition if the House entertains with favor the suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] and, as I am up, I will say, with his indulgence, that all these propositions are before the joint committee on reconstruction, and were before the sub-committees day after day and week after week.

And I will make another remark. I believe I speak with accuracy—and I hope my colleague on the committee will correct me if I do not—when I say that not one single suggestion, taking the form of objection to that proposition, has been made in this House which was not canvassed over and over again in the committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Allow me to ask if the language employed by my colleague [Mr. BROOMALL] was before the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Not the precise language, but the proposition I believe in all its bearing was before the committee and was talked over. It is the proposition which is based upon voting citizens.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Oh, no; on population.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon, I know what it is, because I hold it in my hand. It is proposed that representation shall be in the proportion of adult male citizens duly qualified to vote, compared to the whole number of inhabitants of the States. That is the proposition in brief.

Several MEMBERS. Oh no, it is not.

Mr. BROOMALL. As I have it here, I will read the proviso:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied by the constitution or laws of any State to any proportion of its male citizens over the ages of twenty-one years, the same proportion of its entire population shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the same proposition inverted. There is another proposition which states it the other way, but it comes to the same thing.

I was only going to make one other remark. These objections and these substitutes having been before the committee, I agree entirely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that no good will result from recommitting this subject without instructions. But I also agree, if that is the pleasure of the House, that I ought not to ask, and no gentleman ought to ask to be heard; therefore with great cheerfulness I waive my right to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from New York will allow me a single word. The committee do not at all object to any proposition or any instruction, but we shall be happy to have the House instruct us if we are wrong. Without instructions, it would be worse than in vain, it would be a loss of time, to send the resolution back to the committee. We could agree upon nothing else. We can discern in all the discussion that has taken place here no concentration of mind which would authorize us to adopt any one of the propositions which have been offered. I do hope gentlemen will allow votes to be taken on all the instructions and see which the House will adopt, and then if the House chooses to send the resolution back to us they can do so.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The question which has just arisen between my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] is a corroboration of the position which I took upon this very question. It is impossible that the committee of fifteen can have been in possession of all the discussion that has gone on upon this question, and while I have great confidence in the faithfulness with which they have considered all these various propositions, still I desire to say, and I say it as an evidence of my great confidence in that committee, that if they take back this question, reconsider it without any instructions, and report back the resolution at any time they may think proper, no matter if it is the slightest possible variation, the amendment they propose to it will go far toward strengthening the minds of many in this House who are now doubting, and in the country at large. I believe that a reconsideration of the question by a committee so distinguished as we all concede that committee to be, in the light of all the able discussion that has taken place upon this floor within the last few days, will go very far, not only to strengthen the confidence of members upon this floor who will be called upon to vote upon the proposition, but of the people at large in the country, who, I believe, are expecting and will demand from us an amendment of the Constitution attaining the essential points intended to be attained by the pending proposition. I must, therefore, insist on my motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire again to inquire whether there is any objection to recommitting the resolution now to the committee without any further debate. If there is not, let it be recommitting. We do not object to it, but we do not want to take up further time in discussion.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I call the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be sustained, the question will be first on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND,] to refer the whole subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and then on the motion to recommit without instructions.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] that his motion for the previous question is in violation of the agreement made on Friday, which was that the vote should be taken to-morrow. There are many gentlemen who have staid away to-day under that understanding.

Mr. BLAINE. There will be no yeas and nays. The proposition can be recommitting by common consent.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, that will dispose of the entire subject. I have a right, if I am sustained by one fifth of the members present, to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROOKS. We want to dispose of the proposition, to get rid of it; that is just what we want.

The House divided on the demand for the previous question, and there were—yeas 65, nays 32.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the House do now adjourn, and I call for the yeas and nays on that motion. I think it is unfair to press this matter to a vote to night, in the absence of so many members.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the previous question been seconded?

The SPEAKER. It has been.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then will not this be the first business to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will be the first thing in order after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. All we want is a full vote.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 41, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marston, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Orin, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Defrees, Dixon, Eagle, Egan, Farquhar, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, William Lawrence, Loan, Lougyear, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Price, Sawyer, Stevens, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, and Ward—41.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Grider, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Jenekes, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McKuer, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Noell, Pike, Plants, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Seefeld, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Stephen F. Wilson—75.

So the motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, a report from the Acting Secretary of State, communicating information in regard to a negotiation for the transit of United States troops, in 1861, through Mexican territory; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Crawford county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to provide for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will forever prevent any State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges among its citizens on account of color or descent; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. NESMITH presented a memorial of the Cascade Railroad Company, an incorporation created by the Legislature of Washington Territory, praying for a grant of the right of way through the military reservation along the line of that road; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. GRIMES presented resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of an equalization of bounties to soldiers who enlisted to put down the rebellion; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Postville to Waukon, Allemaque county, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from West Union to Nashua, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of an equalization of the bounties of the thirty-seventh regiment Iowa volunteers, so that the members of that regiment who served their full time of three years may be paid a bounty equal to that paid to members of the same regiment who were mustered out for disability; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART presented a memorial of the Senators and Representative-elect to Congress from Colorado, praying for the admission of that Territory as a State in accordance with the provisions of the enabling act of Congress, approved March 21, 1864, without any other conditions than those imposed by that act; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RIDDLE presented a memorial of citizens of Delaware, praying to be refunded the excess of income tax alleged to have been paid by them for the year 1864 on farm produce; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented two petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will forever prohibit every State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges among naturalized citizens of the United States on account of race or color; which were referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of the Mining Board of Gilpin county, Colorado, remonstrating against the passage of any act affecting the present status of mining claims or titles; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented the petition of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel S. M. Reynolds, paymaster United States volunteers, praying to be relieved from all responsibility on account of money alleged to have been stolen from him on the 22d of December, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Buffalo, New York, praying for an increase of the salaries of naval officers; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Joseph Nock, praying to be indemnified for loss occasioned by an alleged breach of his contract with the Post Office Department for the supply of mail locks and keys for the United States service, and for compensation for the use by the Government of his patent for an improved lock; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of enlisted men of the Signal corps, representing that the duties of that corps have entirely ceased since the surrender of the rebel armies, and praying that Congress may provide by law for the discharge of that corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a petition of assistant assessors of internal revenue of the first collection district of Missouri, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORTON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an equalization of bounties to soldiers in the late war for the Union; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD. I present the memorial of certain German naturalized citizens of the United States, residing in Detroit, in which they say:

"There is no republican government without a realization of the principles of the Declaration of Independence, that all men have an equal right to life, freedom, and happiness. The undersigned entreat Congress to determine legally for the whole Union in the sense of that principle the requisites of republican government as prescribed by the Constitution, among which we before all things place the following: 1. Absolute equality of political as well as civil rights before the law of the single States as well as in the Union, for all citizens of the United States, to whom belong all persons not excluded by the Constitution. 2. Universal suffrage. 3. Prohibition of all class legislation and of all property qualification. 4. Prohibition of all restrictions on free speech, free press, free assembly, and free instruction. 5. Protection to free intercourse and personal safety."

I move that the memorial be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. FESSENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 26) for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there be no objection, I ask the Senate to act upon this joint resolution at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which appropriates $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expenses of the joint committee of Congress appointed to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America, which sum is to be drawn from the Treasury upon the order of the Secretary of the Senate, as it shall be required from time to time by the committee having such investigation in charge; and any portion of the sum thus appropriated that shall be allowed by the joint committee to witnesses attending before it, or to persons employed in its service for per diem, traveling, or other necessary expenses, and paid by the Secretary of the Senate in pursuance of the order of the joint committee, is to be credited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 25) to provide for the adjustment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 85) granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State, reported it with amendments.

SENATOR FROM NEW JERSEY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of JOHN P. STOCKTON, claiming to be elected a Senator from the State of New Jersey, together with a protest of certain members of the Legislature of that State against the validity of his election, have instructed me to make a report accompanied by a resolution. I move that the report, together with the credentials and memorial, be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the resolution be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN P. STOCKTON was duly elected and entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1865.

The report, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a copy of the late report of Major General Sherman upon the condition of the States in his department in which he has lately made a tour of inspection.

TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. BROWN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Post Office Department to construct and operate telegraph lines along the principal mail routes, or such of them as it may deem necessary, or to contract with such lines as may be already established, if that shall be deemed more advisable, for the use and control of such lines, and in connection with its postal business to establish offices at such points as may be determined upon, open at all hours to the public and the press, for the safe and speedy transmission of dispatches under proper regulations and at fixed minimum rates; the committee to report by bill or otherwise.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. I do not propose to indulge in any extended remarks at this time upon the resolution in question, but I deem it right to say a word or two before it goes to the committee.

I do not know of any argument that will support and sustain the present transmission of our mails by the General Government as a work of necessity and public convenience that will not apply with equal force to the new method of intercommunication which is to so large an extent superseding the old method—I refer to the telegraphic system. I believe that it is perfectly feasible for the Post Office Department to take in charge this matter to such extent as may be deemed necessary and as a convenience for the public, just as it has done the mail system, and as it has done the money-order system, both of which have been found so conducive to the public welfare. I do not believe either that it would be a source of additional expense to the Department. On the contrary, I think that it would be a large source of revenue, inasmuch as a large part of the machinery for conducting it is already in existence. There may be some objections to this proposal, and I have no doubt there will be. There may be some objections that I do not now anticipate. There may be objections in the nature of patents upon the modes of transmitting intelligence, upon interests that have already vested, and others of that character; but I have not yet been able to find any which may not be overcome in time and by the proper appliance. It may not be desirable to extend this throughout, but only in certain sections, and thereby to exercise indirectly a control over those lines where it is not in operation.

We all know that there is at this time a very great complaint on the part of the public with the system of transmitting intelligence from one section of the country to the other as now practiced under the telegraphic operation. These complaints are increasing every day, both as to the sinister combinations which control the telegraphic dispatches and as to the negligence which characterizes them, and also as to the fact that in remote sections they become almost unintelligible. I believe that all of that can be remedied by a proper appliance, such as has been suggested. At all events, I desire to elicit consideration from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads on that subject, that they may make inquiry in the proper direction, that they may confer with the Post Office Department in regard to the feasibility and the propriety of taking some steps for putting either this whole branch entirely or in part under some control that will give satisfaction to the public and that will reduce it to what is needed; that is, a minimum rate of transmission of intelligence.

I do not desire to trespass further on the attention of the Senate at this time. I ask that the resolution be passed; it is simply a resolution of inquiry.

The resolution was agreed to.

REVENUE COMMISSION REPORTS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the general and special reports of the revenue commission, exclusive of the forms of bills accompanying the same, be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 111) to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia and organizing an active military force throughout the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 112) authorizing documentary evidence of title to be furnished to the owners of certain lands in the county of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of military reserve on St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SALE OF STAMPS AND ENVELOPES.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the Senate now take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Postmaster General, whenever in his opinion the public service shall require, to sell postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit for such a period of time as he may deem expedient. The person to whom stamps and stamped envelopes are so sold is to engage to sell and circulate them under the instructions of the Postmaster General, and to give bond in such sum as the Postmaster General may direct, with one or more sureties, conditioned for the faithful keeping of the stamps and stamped envelopes so intrusted to him, and for the payment to the Post Office Department, in such manner as may be directed by the Postmaster General, of the moneys arising from the sale of such stamps and stamped envelopes. The Postmaster General may allow to any person purchasing stamps and stamped envelopes under this provision a commission not exceeding five per cent. on all sales of stamps and stamped envelopes by him made, and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department is to audit and settle all such accounts. Such person is to be deemed a receiver and custodian of public money. He is not to sell stamps or stamped envelopes on credit, but to sell them invariably for coin or United States Treasury notes, and at a price not exceeding the price of such stamps and stamped envelopes as provided by law. He is to be subject to all the pains, penalties, fines, and forfeitures now provided by law in cases of receivers and custodians of public money and of postmasters and other persons to whom the sale of stamps and stamped envelopes is intrusted.

An amendment was reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to insert after the word "required" in the fourth line of the first section the words "until the 30th day of June, 1868."

Mr. DIXON. It is thought by the committee, as this bill is intended for a particular exigency, that it should be limited in point of time; and therefore they propose this amendment limiting the action of the bill until the 30th day of June, 1868.

Several SENATORS. What is the exigency?

Mr. DIXON. I shall ask in a moment for the reading of the letter of the Postmaster General. It explains it more briefly than I can do.

Mr. NYE. I wish the mover of the bill would state what the exigency is that requires this unusual proceeding.

Mr. DIXON. Perhaps it would be best to have the vote taken first on the amendment, which is only a matter of detail, and then I shall make the explanation.

Mr. NYE. I think it is due to the Senate that they should be informed what the intention of the bill is, that we may vote understandingly on the amendment.

Mr. DIXON. I ask that the letter of the Postmaster General be read. It states more briefly and clearly than I can do the reasons for the bill.

The Secretary read the following letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 11, 1866.

SIR: I inclose a draft of a law authorizing the Postmaster General to sell stamps on credit.

The object of the law is to enable the Department to circulate its stamps through the States lately in rebellion.

This cannot now be done to any considerable extent, for the reason that the law only authorizes the sale of stamps to postmasters or for cash.

There are many places in the southern States where there are neither persons who can take the oath required by law for the qualification of postmasters, nor persons of sufficient means to enable them to purchase stamps for cash.

I am advised that the demand for stamps is so great in those States that there may be found many persons of responsibility and integrity who, though unable to take the test oath, are able to give good bonds, and would cheerfully become responsible for the stamps intrusted to them, and sell them for the accommodation of the community where they reside.

It is my intention to appoint, so far as practicable, as receivers and vendors of stamps persons who have already been appointed assessors, collectors, &c., and have therefore received the indorsement of the Government.

The compensation proposed is very light, but the penalties provided for are as severe as are now provided by law in all cases of receivers and custodians of public funds.

It is believed that a measure of the character proposed will not only produce considerable revenue to the Department, but will tend to promote a feeling of contentment and subordination among the people of the southern States, and at the same time protect the Department against loss.

Very respectfully, &c.,

W. DENNISON,
Postmaster General.

Hon. JAMES DIXON, Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, United States Senate.

Mr. NYE. I am opposed to this amendment and to the bill itself. I understand from the letter just read that the Postmaster General is furnishing mail facilities to a class of people who are unable to take the oath of allegiance or to take the test oath for the purpose of holding the office of postmaster in this country. If there are such benighted portions of our country where men are unable to present evidence of their loyalty, I believe mail facilities should not be afforded them. If we cannot trust them upon their loyalty, can we trust them in their moneyed obligations? If there is any class of people so poor that they cannot pay postage, let Congress in its magnanimity provide that they shall have it free. But I insist upon it that persons who were lately in rebellion and who are now so rebellious that they cannot take the oath of office are not entitled to advantages over those who have proved their loyalty upon many well-fought fields. I oppose in toto this special legislation for the benefit of rebels, which is not extended to those who have been loyal throughout. There are many portions of the constituency that I represent to whom it would be exceedingly convenient to be allowed credit for their postage if Congress would pass a law for that purpose, and they are as deserving of such favors from Congress as are those whose hands are red with loyal blood.

Mr. DIXON. I think the Senator from Nevada entirely mistakes the object of the bill. He speaks of trusting rebels or any other class of people for their postage. If he will examine the bill, he will see that it expressly provides that no stamps shall be sold on credit; that every person purchasing stamps must pay at the time in coin or in United States currency. That is provided in the second section of the bill. It is not the object of the bill to give credit to any persons whatever who wish to buy and use postage stamps. The difficulty now is that there is no class of persons at the South with whom postage stamps can be intrusted for sale. Persons cannot, in many places, be found capable of holding the office of postmaster. We know perfectly well that the whole mass of the southern people were engaged in this rebellion, almost without exception, so that there are not now to be found parties there who can take the oath of office, which is retrospective in its character, except in comparatively few instances. The present law provides that stamps shall only be furnished to postmasters upon credit; they only can receive them. Private individuals cannot receive them in that way. We cannot everywhere appoint postmasters who can receive stamps on credit, and as we cannot find parties in the South ready to advance money to the Government for the stamps, the difficulty is that there are, in important sections, no stamps for sale. Who suffer? Not the rebels only, but my constituents and the constituents of the Senator from Nevada. They write letters to the South, but often no return can come, because no postage stamp can be had.

Now, what do we propose to do? We barely propose that if any individual, at the discretion of the Postmaster General, can give bonds for $100 or $500 worth of stamps he may receive them and he may sell them to such parties as require them, for cash, and only for cash. It would not do to allow him to sell them on credit, as this would interfere with the sale by postmasters; but if he is merely a custodian of these stamps, and sells them to individuals who wish to use them for the time being, for cash, I do not see how we are favoring rebels.

The fact is, Mr. President, the public interest must not suffer if we can avoid it. Here is a vast public interest. The object is not to benefit rebels; it is to benefit the whole community, and, if possible, to facilitate intercourse by means of the post office. For my part I cannot see, nor could the committee, how this is any way showing favor to rebels in any part of the country. The Postmaster General did not like to evade the law; other officers have been charged with its evasion; I do not say that they have been guilty of it; but he wishes to follow out the letter of the law, and if he appoints a postmaster he requires him to take the oath; but he does believe, and the committee believe, that it is safe to leave postage stamps with a party who can give good bonds, and that it is not necessary to require him to swear that he has never been engaged in rebellion. If you do require that, you deprive not only that community but the whole northern community of intercommunication. The bill enables the Postmaster General to avoid that evil.

Mr. NYE. If I understand the Senator correctly, he assumes that loyal men cannot be found in the lately rebellious States to take these offices. I have understood, by the way, that the Post Office Department had regarded carefully its duty in not appointing those who could not take the oath.

Mr. DIXON. So I understand.

Mr. NYE. If that is so, the result is that there are no post offices there; and for this Government to become a vender at retail of three cent stamps, it seems to me is a small business and should not be engaged in. Sir, if it is true that there are not loyal men enough in the States lately in rebellion to fill the post offices, this Government should not furnish them postal facilities. If it is true that they are suffering for the want of these stamps, how easy it is for their moneyed men, who want to sell them under this bill, to send to New York and purchase $500 or $5,000 worth of them. I repeat that it is not at all proper, neither is it necessary for the public exigency, that this Government should become the creditor of rebels. This Government should see to it that every officer in it is loyal, or there should be no officers. To gather these elements of official station around us with this official power inimical to the best interests of this country, is inviting an element of weakness which we cannot afford. If the rich men of the South want to supply their poor neighbors with post office stamps let them send to New York, or Hartford, or Boston, and buy as many as they please, and pay for them, and let them give credit to such as they please. But, sir, I insist upon it this would be opening a dangerous door for any Department of this Government to enter. I object, therefore, to the amendment and to the bill itself.

Mr. CONNESS. This bill was considered with a good deal of care in the office of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I cannot see that it is obnoxious to the objections made by the honorable Senator, my friend from Nevada. As stated by the chairman of the committee, it is not proposed to retail stamps on credit. It is well known to the honorable Senator, as it is to every Senator and to the country, that it is exceedingly difficult to obtain agents for the transaction of all the business of the Government in the States lately in rebellion. What shall be done? Does the Senator propose that they shall have no government there? Does the Senator propose that in every instance we shall appoint men from the North or from the States formerly free to go down there and fill every office? I apprehend that I am as strenuous in my love of loyalty, that I am as desirous that loyal men, where it can be done, shall be the agents, and they only the agents of the Government, as the honorable Senator from Nevada or any other Senator. But, sir, if you are to have a government there at all, if the influence of the Government is to reach that people at all, they must be reached to a greater or lesser degree at some time through their own citizens.

I would have the honorable Senator think of this, and think of it, not simply with reference to the crimes these men have committed, but with reference both to the present and the future. I do not propose to impose the higher range of duties upon men who have come out of the rebellion with their hands stained with its crimes; but the Departments of this Government must have agents in those States. Agents already employed by the Treasury Department, the Interior Department, and other Departments of the Government, will be employed in this connection by the Post Office Department; stamps will be sold to them on credit. I apprehend that the Postmaster General is as anxious as the honorable Senator can be to find loyal men, and will find loyal men in every instance where he can do so, to do this and all other business connected with his Department. But if we are to conduct ourselves toward these States, or Territories, if you please—I do not care what you call them—if we are to conduct ourselves toward the people of the South upon the basis now suggested by the honorable Senator, there can be no reconstruction. There is not the most extreme advocate of a congressional plan for reconstruction who does not suppose, I apprehend, that at some period, say not further distant than two years from this time, those States will resume their place in the Union, and the people who were formerly rebels assume a position of loyalty again to the Government. Now, it is proposed that the officers appointed by other Departments of the Government in these States, and found faithful in their trusts, shall be intrusted to buy postage stamps from the Government to facilitate postal business among the people there.

Sir, I hope that the course of opposition to this bill will not be pursued. As I said before, I feel as strenuous on the subject of loyalty as any Senator, but I cannot go to the length proposed by the Senator from Nevada. I am for peace; I am for a lasting peace as much as the Senator can be; but I think it cannot come by denying to the people of the South every facility that is proposed to be extended to them by the Departments, who have fully considered the matter. I hope the Senator from Nevada will not persist in his objections. I hardly think they are well founded, and I think we cannot proceed upon the basis that he presents.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, so far as I have observed or been able to ascertain what is the fact in these rebellious States, there are now there two classes of what you may call Union people. There are some few remaining there who have always been Union men; they were Union men at the breaking out of the rebellion; they remained Union men through the rebellion, and would not touch it or have any part in it. There are other people who have been in the rebellion, but who now call themselves Union men. I fear the operation of this bill will be to place in office the men who now call themselves Union men, and to leave the old, true Union men under the ban of these new and pretended Union men. I found this difficulty the other day: a man, perfectly loyal, who had fled from Mobile on account of his Union sentiments, and has remained here in poverty, desired to return there, and some of the people there asked to have him appointed postmaster. He came to me to inquire what were the proper steps to be taken. I said to him, "Get some of the Union men in Mobile to ask that you shall be appointed." "But," said he, "what kind of Union men do you want, those who have been in the rebellion and are now Union men, or the old and true Union men? I could get the latter, but they are entirely discarded and will not do me any good." I want the Department to bring up those old Union men, not the men who have been in rebellion and have now turned Union men, but the men who have always been true to the Government; and I think, if the Department will seek for them and bring them from under the ban, socially and politically, you can have in these offices true Union men.

But, sir, I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut one question. The difficulty, as I understand, here is that the Department cannot find loyal postmasters who can take the oath, and so they can have no postmasters with whom to lodge these stamps for sale. I ask, then, what do you want to sell stamps for if you have got no post offices and no postmasters? What are you going to do with a letter there when you put a stamp upon it? Are you going to carry it afoot? I think you had better establish your post offices first.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator desire an answer now?

Mr. CLARK. Any time.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator partially misunderstood what I said. I did not say there were no postmasters there; the Postmaster General does not say that. He says there is a difficulty in finding proper parties to appoint. There are postmasters in the States lately in rebellion, but there are not as many of them as could be wished. There ought to be a post office in every village, and I trust the time will soon come when there will be. There are many post offices and many postmasters, loyal men, there; but there are wide districts of country where there are no post offices and no postmasters, and what then is done? They send their letters by private individuals, when stamped, to the nearest post office. I presume sometimes they have to go fifty miles, sometimes twenty, sometimes less, to the nearest post office; but the letter must be stamped, and if they cannot find any place where stamps can be purchased what can they do? The letter cannot be sent.

The Senator from Nevada says, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me to go on, that moneyed men can come forward if they see fit and advance the money for these stamps. What interest have moneyed men there or here in doing that? They receive no compensation for it. Business men, it is true, who have other business, retailers, will sometimes keep postage stamps on hand, and advance the money for them; but the difficulty is, that in these States there is less money than loyalty. They are not only in some cases disloyal, but in all cases they are poor. There are but very few men there who could advance this money, for the money is not there. Now, as to their loyalty, I think a man may be loyal and true to the Government at this time who cannot take the required oath. That is my judgment. I think I could name individuals who, as the Senator himself would agree, are now loyal men, but who cannot take the retrospective oath that they have never taken any part in the rebellion against the Government. Nearly all the people of the South have directly or indirectly aided the rebellion at some time or other, and hence they cannot take this oath which is retrospective in its character.

As I stated before, the object of this bill is not to benefit any one class of the community; it is to benefit the business of the whole country. I claim that it is as much for the benefit of the North as for the benefit of the South. A letter is written from the North; it goes to a correspondent in the South, in Mobile for example; a reply cannot be forwarded unless a postage stamp can be obtained; I have no doubt they can be obtained in the city of Mobile, because there probably men can be found who retail other articles who will sell postage stamps, and I believe there is a postmaster at Mobile; but as I said before, there are wide districts of country where there are very great difficulties in obtaining them, and the object of this bill is solely to allow men to be the keepers of stamps who can furnish good security that they will pay for them, who have not the cash on hand to pay for them, and who cannot take the retrospective test oath. I think, therefore, the public interest requires the passage of the bill.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, perhaps I attach too much importance to this bill, but I am frank to confess that the importance I attach to it is not so much upon the face of the measure as upon its result. I deem it the duty of every Department of this Government, when looking around for persons to discharge official duties pertaining to it, to find, if possible, loyal men. I deny the proposition that there is not to be found in every community in the southern States some man fit to hold the office of postmaster whose pulse has not beaten every moment since the rebellion broke out in unison with its interests. The difficulty is that we have only heretofore been allowed when speaking of the South to speak of the ruling classes, and the South, when they spoke of themselves, only spoke of the ruling classes. It is the duty of this Government to let up a class of men who have been trodden down under the iron heel of the rulers of the South. There are thousands of them in every State. Every Department in this city is full of men exiled from their homes by the class of men who now want credit on postage stamps, who could go back there clothed with the garments of official power and have around them the shield and the halo of Government protection. But, sir, they are allowed to famish here upon little salaries, exiled from their homes and from their fortunes, and the Department here look around among the class whose hands are reddened with the blood of loyalty, and say they cannot find men to act as postmasters there who can take the oath.

Sir, they cannot find them among that class who instigated and carried on the rebellion. I trust in God the day will never come when one of that class can take an oath that will entitle him to hold an office under this Government. Sir, if we would preserve it intact, if we would keep the serpent out of our bosom that has stung us well-nigh unto death, we must let the class of men who cannot take this oath alone; we must go among the poor of the South, among the free-born whites of the South. Ignorant as they are, every inspiration of their heart, and every prayer from their lips, has been for the preservation of this Union; and nothing ever gladdened their hearts so much as to see the old stars and stripes take the place of that mongrel substitute which these men who cannot take the oath reared over them. The time has come when this Government, in its legislative and executive departments, should lift up the bowed down and heal these breaches by the panacea of true Unionism.

I object, therefore, to this special legislation in favor of that class who come up here self-convicted, acknowledging their inability, without saying, "We are no longer worthy to be called thy sons," but who now want what they have always sought after, the official pap of this Government. Sir, go through Alabama, and you can find men capable of being postmasters everywhere. Alabama furnished fifteen thousand men to the Union Army. Where are they with their wounds and scars which testify to their undying loyalty? They could be postmasters, I take it. Go to Tennessee; go to Georgia; go to Florida, and everywhere you will find men scarred in the battles for this Union, who would be glad to get a postmastership. Give it to them—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 61.

Mr. DIXON. With the consent of the Senate I desire, without pressing this bill at this time, as the morning hour has expired, to say a single word in reply to the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 61 is now before the Senate, but it can be laid aside by common consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill of the Senator from Connecticut will come up in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK. I gave way to the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Nevada, and I shall be entitled to the floor upon the bill when it comes up again unless I have lost it by too much indulgence. However, I can get it again at some time I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Connecticut will be entitled to the floor to reply, as he says, to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Nevada says—

Mr. NYE. If this debate is to be continued I was not quite through with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor on this bill, if he claims it.

Mr. NYE. I prefer that the bill should lie over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I insist on the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 61 is before the Senate.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL to the first section of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to have the amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section one, line three, after the word "that" to insert "all persons of African descent born in the United States are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, and;" so that it will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That all persons of African descent born in the United States are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, and there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery, &c.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Mr. President, when I interrupted the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary yesterday to make an inquiry, I made it in entire good faith, and for the purpose of eliciting information on the subject in order that I might know how to vote on this amendment. I had believed, and had avowed that belief on this floor in April, 1864, that persons of African descent in this country were not citizens of the United States; and with the permission of the Senate I will read an extract from my speech at that time as giving the reasons for that opinion. I said then:

"I ask, first, whether persons of the negro race are, or indeed can be, citizens of the United States without a constitutional amendment? Most certainly they were not counted among 'we the people' who established the national Constitution, nor were they at that time, so far as I am informed, admitted to exercise the rights and privileges of citizenship in any State. From the foundation of the Government, they could not obtain passports to foreign countries from the State Department. These are contemporaneous interpretations of the Constitution which cannot be disregarded. At various periods since and in many instances the courts of the States, and of the United States, have decided that they are not citizens. The constitution of Indiana, and the laws of several States, forbid them to come within their borders for permanent residence, which prohibitions would be of no effect if they are citizens. Whatever privileges individual States may accord to them they cannot make them citizens of the United States, so as to be 'entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.' They are not citizens by birth, for the common law of England is not of force under the national Constitution. That they cannot be made citizens by incidentally calling them such in an act of Congress is palpable. Whether that body can make them citizens by an act passed for the purpose is, perhaps, doubtful. Their position is certainly anomalous, but there is no more perfect right possessed by communities and societies of every kind than that of excluding from citizenship or membership such persons as they deem proper."

That I may not be mistaken in regard to what I mean by a citizen, I will say that I mean by that term one who is an integer of the body-politic or community. By that it will be perceived I include only those who go to make up the nation. There may be residing among any people those who, under the English law, are called denizens, or there may be aliens not naturalized, or aliens who are there for temporary purposes; or, taking the first two classes, aliens who have come here with a determination to remain here, or those who are entitled to the claim of denizens, although they go to make up the body of the people, yet they are not citizens of the State or country. I am confirmed in the belief which I have entertained on this subject by the fact that in another part of this Capitol within two weeks past two bills have been introduced proposing to declare these people citizens of the United States; and now that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, with, I presume, the approbation of that committee, has made a similar proposition in this body, it certainly yields the point that they are not citizens, and my doubts on the subject, so far as I entertained them, have been removed.

I think, sir, that we have now at last got to the beginning of all these questions in reference to the negro race. I think it needs a constitutional amendment to make these people citizens of the United States. I am not satisfied with the reasons given by the Senator from Illinois yesterday for doing it under the clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to pass uniform laws of naturalization. I think it is one of the gravest subjects that ever could be submitted to the people of the United States, and it involves not only the negro race, but other inferior races that are now settling on our Pacific coast, and perhaps involves a future immigration to this country of which we have no conception, for a bill has been introduced at the other end of the Capitol to strike out the word "white" from the naturalization laws, so that we may expect to have an influx here of all sorts of people from all countries. I need not pause to say that this would be detrimental to the best interests of our country. I am willing to receive among us, and always have been, those from other countries who are calculated to make good citizens. I am not and never have been willing to receive, if the discrimination could be made, those whose mixture with our race, whether they are white or black, could only tend to the deterioration of the mass; and I avow myself now as opposed to the amendment which is now before the Senate for the reasons that I have already stated.

Here let me say before proceeding further, that if by authoritative action of the people of the United States, by the deliberate expression of those who may be properly charged to express their voice in relation to this matter, it should be declared that these persons of African descent or of foreign races are citizens of the United States, I should feel very different about the vote that I might give in relation to the subject in my own State. I believe there are certain fundamental and eternal principles that lie at the foundation of society; and if you make these people citizens of the United States, I should feel that they were entitled to the right of suffrage. Of course, this must be governed by circumstances of various kinds, so that some restrictions may be placed upon them as we place restrictions upon others.

I entertain what perhaps may be deemed peculiar ideas in reference to the condition of society, which I have somewhat announced in the extract that I have already read. I do not believe one word of what the chairman of the Judiciary Committee read from Blackstone yesterday. I think it is mere twaddle, and if closely examined will be so pronounced by every one who gives sufficient attention to the subject. I cannot conceive of a state of nature such as is spoken of there. I know not of people entering into society. It is never done and never has been done. What I do think I know is this: I believe the constitution of society was given to man by the Creator at the time it was instituted, and that whatever conditions were imposed at that time are those to which men should endeavor to live up.

We hear a great deal about the sentence from the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal." I am willing to admit that all men are created equal, but how are they equal? Can a citizen of France, for instance, by going into England be entitled to all the rights of a citizen of that country, or by coming into this country acquire all the rights of an American, unless he is naturalized? Can a citizen of our country by going into any other become entitled to the rights of a citizen there? If not, it may be said that they are not equal. I believe that the division of men into separate communities and their living in society and association with their fellows, as they do, are both divine institutions, and that, consequently, the authors of the Declaration of Independence could have meant nothing more than that the rights of citizens of any community are equal to the rights of all other citizens of that community. Whenever all communities are conducted in accordance with these principles, these very conditions of their prosperous existence, then all mankind will be equal, each enjoying his equality in his own community, and not till then. Therefore, I asserted in the speech from which I have already read, that there was no right that could be exercised by any community of society more perfect than that of excluding from citizenship or membership those who were objectionable. If a little society is formed for a benevolent, literary, or any other purpose, the members immediately exercise, and claim the right to exercise that right; they determine who shall come into their community. We have the right to determine who shall be members of our community, and much as has been said here about what God has done, and about our obligations to the Almighty in reference to this matter, I do not see where it comes in that we are bound to receive into our community those whose mingling with us might be detrimental to our interests. I do not believe that a superior race is bound to receive among it those of an inferior race if the mingling of them can only tend to the detriment of the mass. I do not mean strict miscegenation, but I mean the mingling of two races in society, associating from time to time with each other.

I am speaking without immediate preparation. I did not suppose that this subject would have come before us as soon as yesterday, nor did I suppose that this matter would have come to a vote to-day. I have stated plainly the ideas which have led me to the conclusion that we have a right to exclude these people and all other people of the inferior races from becoming citizens, if we so choose. I have said as much as I need say as to the propriety of doing so. On that subject every Senator must judge for himself.

But I must say that, in my opinion, notwithstanding the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary yesterday, the mode in which it is proposed to effect this object is neither constitutional nor legal. I do not think that the clause that is proposed to be introduced into this bill, providing that persons of African descent are and shall be hereafter citizens of this country, is sufficient to do it. If they are not, as seems to be admitted on all hands, at this time citizens of the United States, they must be got in under some authority of the Constitution. The gentleman points us to the clause authorizing naturalization. I was mistaken yesterday in saying that the language of the Constitution expressly applied to the naturalization of foreigners; but I apprehend from the term used that I was not wrong in the conclusion that that clause was intended to apply to foreigners only. Be that as it may, however, the clause of the Constitution is that there shall be a uniform rule on the subject of naturalization. I cannot say that I know of any decision as to the force of that word "uniform." Taking it, however, in its ordinary acceptation, it would seem to mean this at least, with other things, perhaps, that the laws in reference to the naturalization of all persons should be uniform. We have laws in force for the naturalization of foreigners; and I would remind the chairman of the committee that the case he cited of the Stockbridge Indians was also the naturalization of foreigners; for we hold the Indian tribes to be quasi foreign nations; we, at least, make treaties with them, which are confirmed by this body. The laws of naturalization as they stand require a notice to be given and a renunciation of the allegiance to all foreign Powers, and require that notice to be given, I believe, two years before the application is made; but there is no provision of that sort in this proposition. I should be very willing to have the question submitted in some form to the people of the United States, whether they desire to admit to citizenship this class of persons; and I do not confine it to the African race alone, but I include the races on the Pacific coast that I have already mentioned, and others to whom it is proposed to open the doors. I would like to see it tested by a fair vote of the people of the United States whether they are willing that these piebald races from every quarter shall come in and be citizens with them in this country, and enjoy the privileges which they are now enjoying as such citizens. I think it would not be fair to bring in an amendment to the Constitution proposing to make them citizens, with a view to submitting it to the Legislatures now in session; and therefore I should prefer, if any such provision is to be introduced and passed, that it should go to the conventions of the people, or, at least, that it should be so timed that it would go before the Legislatures to be elected in the coming summer or fall, so that the voice of the people may be expressed upon it. If that voice shall be in favor of it, if the majority of the people of the United States shall declare that these people are citizens, I shall be among the first to endeavor to do my whole duty toward them by recognizing them as citizens in every respect.

I refused to join the American party at the time of its first formation because I thought it discriminated between naturalized citizens and native citizens. However much I might disapprove of the naturalization law previously to that time, I felt that while that was the law, and while these people were admitted under the law, they were entitled to all the rights and privileges and the same treatment as other citizens; and if these dusky people shall also be admitted to the rights of citizenship in such a way as I believe contains a fair expression of the people, and is according to the Constitution, I pledge myself to treat them in the same way that I was disposed to treat our naturalized citizens.

I think, sir, that this subject is one of great importance; I think it is one of the most important we have ever had before us growing out of (if this may be said to grow out of) the war; and I trust that at least it will not be passed through this Senate in a hurry or without due examination. There are others here much more capable of doing justice to this subject on the one side and the other than I am, who, I hope, will let us hear from them, and give us their views in relation to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No action having been taken upon that amendment, I desire to withdraw it and to offer another in lieu of it to the same purport, changing the phraseology. In the third line of the first section, after the word "that," I move to insert these words:

All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color and.

So that the section will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color, and there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery, &c.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I will ask the Senator if he intends by that amendment to naturalize all the Indians of the United States?

Mr. HOWARD. That is the very question I was about to put.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Our dealings with the Indians are with them as foreigners, as separate nations. We deal with them by treaty, and not by law, except in reference to those who are incorporated into the United States as some are, and are taxable and become citizens, and then it would be desirable that it should apply to the Indians so far as those who are domesticated and pay taxes and live in civilized society are concerned. In reference to the other tribes, they will not be embraced by this provision because we have always treated the Indian tribes as nations with whom we made treaties. The intention is not to embrace them. If the Senator from Kentucky thinks the language would embrace them, I should have no objection to changing it so as to exclude the Indians. It is not intended to include them.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The right of citizenship is a great boon, and may well be supposed to be given to the Indians if you use language strong enough to give it to them; and as they are mere dependents upon the Government, living in the United States, I think they would be made citizens under such a provision as this.

Mr. COWAN. I will ask whether it will not have the effect of naturalizing the children of Chinese and Gypsies born in this country?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COWAN. Then I think it would be proper to hear the Senators from California on that question, because that population is now becoming very heavy upon the Pacific coast; and when we consider that it is in proximity to an empire containing four hundred million people, very much given to emigrating, very rapacious in their character, and very astute in their dealings, if they are to be made citizens and to enjoy political power in California, then, sir, the day may not be very far distant when California, instead of belonging to the Indo-European race, may belong to the Mongolian, may belong to the Chinese; because it certainly would not be difficult for that empire, with her resources, and with the means she has, to throw a population upon California and the mining districts of that country that would overwhelm our race and wrest from them the dominion of that country.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of my friend from Pennsylvania, if the children of Chinese now born in this country are not citizens?

Mr. COWAN. I think not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that under the naturalization laws the children who are born here of parents who have not been naturalized are citizens. That is the law, as I understand it, at the present time. Is not the child born in this country of German parents a citizen? I am afraid we have got very few citizens in some of the counties of good old Pennsylvania if the children born of German parents are not citizens.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator assumes that which is not the fact. The children of German parents are citizens; but Germans are not Chinese; Germans are not Australians, nor Hottentots, nor anything of the kind. That is the fallacy of his argument.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will show me in the law any distinction made between the children of German parents and the children of Asiatic parents, I might be able to appreciate the point which he makes; but the law makes no such distinction; and the child of an Asiatic is just as much a citizen as the child of a European.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to this state of facts: most of the Indians of our State have taken an allotment of lands, and our supreme court have decided that by the act of accepting the allotments, they have separated themselves from their tribal relations; and I suppose the chairman does not intend to make the Indians of Kansas citizens of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are already citizens of the United States if they are separated from their tribes and incorporated in your community.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But they are not. We do not intend to extend to them the right of citizenship, but our supreme court have decided that their lands are taxable and that they are separated from their tribes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he did not state within the last year or two on the floor of the Senate, that the very best specimens of manhood he had ever seen were a cross between the negro and Indian of his State?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I said south of Kansas, and I reiterate it now, and I hope the Territorial Committee will introduce a bill having for its object the protection of that magnificent race.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I am asked, with quite an air of certainty on the part of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whether the children of persons of barbarian races, born in this country, are not from that very fact citizens of this country. I am not prepared upon the moment to furnish authorities upon this point; but I am certainly very clear that in Pennsylvania that is not the law, and never has been the law; and to assert that it is the law, in my judgment, is to betray an utter want of comprehension, an utter inappreciation of the fundamental principles which underlie the whole of our system. Who was it that established this Government? They were people who brought here the charter of their liberties with them; they were the freemen who emigrated to this country and established these governments, and they established them under charters legally granted them by the Crown of Great Britain originally. By the terms of the charters they were the actual possessors of the political power of the colonies, and they alone had the right to say whom they would admit to a coenjoyment of that power with them. It is true that the colonists of this country, when they came here and established their governments, did open the door of these privileges wide to men of their own race from Europe. They opened it to the Irishman, they opened it to the German, they opened it to the Scandinavian races of the North. But where did they open it to the barbarian races of Asia or of Africa? Nowhere. There may be no positive prohibition; but the courts always administered the law upon the basis that it was only the freemen who established this Government and those whom the freemen admitted with them to an enjoyment of political power that were entitled to it.

The identical question came up in my State—the question whether the negro was a citizen, and whether he possessed political power in that State—and it was there decided that he was not one of the original corporators, that he was not one of the freemen who originally possessed political power, and that they had never, by any enactment or by any act of theirs, admitted him into a participation of that power, except so far as to tax him for the support of government. And, Mr. President, I think it a most important question, and particularly a most important question for the Pacific coast, and those States which lie upon it, as to whether this door shall now be thrown open to the Asiatic population. If it be, there is an end to republican government there, because it is very well ascertained that those people have no appreciation of that form of government; it seems to be obnoxious to their very nature; they seem to be incapable either of understanding it or of carrying it out; and I cannot consent to say that California, or Oregon, or Colorado, or Nevada, or any of those States shall be given over to an irruption of Chinese. I, for my part, protest against it.

I may say, while I am up, that I am entirely opposed to the whole of this first section; and, in my judgment, it has not a particle of constitutional warrant. As I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, he takes his ground upon an amendment to the Constitution of the United States recently passed. The first section of that amendment is in these words:

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

Now, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, in all good faith, what was the meaning of that? What was its intent? Can there be any doubt of it? Is there a sane man within the sound of my voice who does not know precisely what was intended by the American people in adopting that amendment to the Constitution? I may say there is no shirking this thing; there is no way of dodging it or avoiding it. We must meet it; and if we are men we will meet it, and we will meet it in the spirit in which it was made. That amendment, everybody knows and nobody dare deny, was simply made to liberate the negro slave from his master. That is all there is of it. Will the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary or anybody else undertake to say that that was to prevent the involuntary servitude of my child to me, of my apprentice to me, or the quasi servitude which the wife to some extent owes to her husband? Certainly not. Nobody pretends that it was to be wider in its operation than to cover the relation which existed between the master and his negro African slave.

Now, mark it, that particular relation and the breaking of it up, is the subject of that first clause of the amendment, and it does not extend any further, and cannot by any possible implication, contortion, or straining, be made to go further among honest men. That was followed by another clause, and a very proper clause, which everybody at the time understood, and which I have never known anybody to be mistaken about until I came into the Senate of the United States this session. That other clause was this:

"Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Enforce what? The breaking of the bond by which the negro slave was held to his master; that is all. It was not intended to overturn this Government and to revolutionize all the laws of the various States everywhere. It was intended, in other words, and a lawyer would have so construed it, to give to the negro the privilege of the habeas corpus; that is, if anybody persisted in the face of the constitutional amendment in holding him as a slave, that he should have an appropriate remedy to be delivered. That is all.

Now, let us see what is made out of that simple provision. The bill provides in its first section that "there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery." "Previous condition of slavery," I agree, is a certain enough phrase in the law; but I should like the honorable Senator from Illinois or any other Senator to tell me what is meant by the word "race," and where it is settled that there are two races of men, and if it is settled that there are two or more, how many. Where is the line to be drawn? What constitute the distinctive characteristics and marks which limit and bound these races? If a State did not desire to make a distinction on account of race, I suppose it might lawfully make a distinction on account of hair. If it desired to single out any class of its citizens and subject them to special laws, it would be a good description, and would not be obnoxious to the terms of this bill, if it were to say that it should apply to all persons whose hair was ribbon-shaped and curled naturally, and not to persons whose hair was cylindrical.

Then "color" is another word upon which nobody is very well advised just at present. Men are of all shades of color, and the races of men differ from the deepest jet up to the fairest of lily white all over the world. But I am not disposed to quarrel with that part of the bill, and I only notice it as an indication of the loose manner in which we legislate about these subjects. I go on a little further.

But the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts—the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property.

Why, Mr. President, if under color of this constitutional amendment we have a right to pass such a law as this, we have a right to overturn the States themselves completely; and will you be surprised when I tell you that this repeals statutes of Pennsylvania, which I have under my fingers; and not only repeals them, but by the provisions of this bill the judges and other officers of Pennsylvania who should undertake to enforce her own laws would be subject, not to revision in a court of error, but subject to a criminal prosecution in courts where the jury are the judges not only of the fact, but of the law as well, under our system?

I suppose if there is any one thing more than another which a State prizes it is that she has the right to regulate the descent of estates. There is not a State in the Union which has not statutes to regulate the descent and distribution of estates, and I do not know whether there are any States in the Union who have not certain provisions on that subject with regard to aliens. It is only by an especial statute in Pennsylvania that aliens can inherit the estates of deceased ancestors, and that perhaps in compliance to the fact that the great majority of our people were originally of foreign blood, and if there was not a reciprocity between Pennsylvania and the foreign State we might be the sufferers by it. If we did not allow the foreign heirs to inherit from the domiciled ancestor here, they might not allow the emigrant here to inherit from the ancestor who remained abroad. But there is a provision in our statutes which will be repealed by this bill if it becomes a law. Let me read it:

"It shall and may be lawful for any alien or aliens actually resident within this Commonwealth, and not being the subject or subjects of some sovereign State or Power, which is or shall be, at the time or times of such purchase or purchases, at war with the United States of America, to purchase lands, tenements, and hereditaments within this Commonwealth, and to have and to hold the same in fee simple or for any lesser estate, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as any natural-born citizen or citizens may or can do: Provided always, That such alien or aliens shall, previous to such purchase or purchases, declare his or their intention to become a citizen or citizens of the United States, agreeably to any law of the United States at that time in force upon that subject: And provided also, That no such alien or aliens shall be competent to purchase and hold more than five hundred acres until he or they shall have actually become a citizen or citizens of the United States."

Now, it will be observed that the provisions of this bill override and contravene that law of ours. What I mean to say is that nobody can pretend, nobody can believe that it was intended by this clause of the Constitution to confer any such authority as that upon this Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me a moment?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does he pretend to deny that this Government had just that power before this constitutional amendment was adopted?

Mr. COWAN. I do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like, then, to ask the Senator one or two other questions.

Mr. COWAN. Half a dozen if you please.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator deny that the Federal Government has authority to naturalize any person; that it may provide by uniform laws of naturalization to naturalize any foreigner?

Mr. COWAN. Must provide by uniform law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They can do that?

Mr. COWAN. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it could authorize any one of those persons to purchase just as much land in Pennsylvania as he pleased, by declaring them all citizens—could it not?

Mr. COWAN. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then the power existed before the passage of the constitutional amendment to authorize any persons, aliens from abroad, who came into Pennsylvania, the moment they put foot in Pennsylvania (by making them citizens) to hold as much land as they please. What becomes of your argument that there was no power in Congress to do it?

Mr. COWAN. The argument stands; but what becomes of the position in which the honorable Senator places himself? He has utterly mistaken the point in question. Nobody denied that after foreigners were naturalized they could purchase land. That is not the question. The question is whether the General Government before naturalization can confer upon aliens this privilege. I do not desire to ask questions triumphantly, as though I was certainly right, because I am in this debate upon the spur of the moment; but I would ask the honorable Senator whether there is not every distinction in the world between the right of a man after naturalization and before, as viewed by these statutes. These statutes do not provide that a naturalized citizen shall not have all the rights of every other citizen, but provide what his rights shall be before naturalization; so that the power which the United States originally had has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was looking at it as a question of power. That is the only light in which I was trying to answer the Senator from Pennsylvania. Now, this bill provides that all the inhabitants of the States shall have the same rights. The Senator from Pennsylvania says that that must be unconstitutional because the Federal Government has no right to declare that the inhabitant of Pennsylvania who came from abroad may purchase real estate in that State. As a question of power, he says that. Now, I reply to that, and he admits it, that as a question of power the Federal Government has the power to make every inhabitant of Pennsylvania a citizen. Then could not every inhabitant of Pennsylvania own real estate, and could Pennsylvania deny the right? The Senator is arguing against this as unconstitutional; he says we have no power to do it. Whether it would be politic to do it is another question. The argument of the gentleman on that point I shall not now undertake to answer, but I say it is a demonstrable fact, as much so as a mathematical proposition, that the Federal Government has authority to make every inhabitant of Pennsylvania a citizen, and clothe him with the authority to inherit and buy real estate, and the State of Pennsylvania cannot help it.

Mr. COWAN. Every alien-born citizen?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Every inhabitant of the State, no matter where born.

Mr. COWAN. I think I comprehend now the drift of the argument. It is because the United States has a right to naturalize aliens, therefore the United States has a right to authorize people who are not aliens to do what is forbidden by the several States! Is not that a fair statement of the Senator's argument? It is, that because the United States has a right to naturalize persons born abroad, and to confer upon them, if you please, all these rights, therefore it may do it without naturalization under the provisions of this bill! If I do not state his proposition fairly, I trust that I shall be corrected. Then, I say again, that by the provisions of this bill, without naturalizing the alien, without bringing him within that uniform rule which must be adopted before any alien can be naturalized, he is made here able to hold lands and do just as everybody else in Pennsylvania.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not wish to pursue this controversy, but—

Mr. COWAN. I would prefer to have the honorable Senator reserve what he has to say until after I have concluded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not interrupt the Senator again, and shall not do so now if the Senator desires me not to do it. I was going merely to set that one thing right.

Mr. COWAN. Now, as I understand the meaning and intent of this bill, it is that there shall be no discrimination made between the inhabitants of the several States of this Union, none in any way. In Pennsylvania, for the greater convenience of the people, and for the greater convenience, I may say, of both classes of the people, in certain districts the Legislature has provided schools for colored children, has discriminated as between the two classes of children. We put the African children in this school-house and the white children over in that school-house, and educate them there as we best can. Is this amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery to break up that system which Pennsylvania has adopted for the education of her white and colored children? Are the school directors who carry out that law and who make this distinction between these classes of children to be punished for a violation of this statute of the United States? To me it is monstrous. How anybody desiring to be fair, desiring to construe the Constitution according to its fair intent and meaning, can drag out of it such a conclusion, such a monstrous conclusion as this, I cannot see.

I am very free to say, as I have said here before over and over, that I am perfectly willing, so far as my State is concerned, to vote for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States which will secure to all men of every color and of every race and of every condition their natural rights, the rights which God has given them, the right to life, the right to liberty, the right to property. I am willing to do that because that was the great inheritance which our ancestors won for us, and now in this country I am willing for my part to extend it to all others, even the descendants of barbarian races, even to those who were brought up and reared in Asiatic civilization. But I am not prepared exactly to say that I would vote for that amendment to the Constitution if I represented the State of California now, because I am not prepared to say whether or not the contingency may come upon that coast when our people will have to assert their dominion by depriving that race which is now making inroads upon them of even the natural rights which usually belong to men in society.

But, Mr. President, that is neither here nor there; this is not an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; this is an attempt to do without any power that which it might be very questionable whether we ought to do even if we had the power. At the same time, I say that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to vote for such an amendment to the Constitution; and it is only by means of a constitutional amendment that such a result can be worked. I agree entirely with everything said by my honorable friend from West Virginia on that point, and I consider his reasoning as conclusive upon it.

There is a great deal more in this bill that is exceedingly objectionable. It is the first time I think in the history of civilized legislation that a judicial officer has been held up and subjected to a criminal punishment for that which may have been a conscientious discharge of his duty. It is, I say, the first case that I know of in the legislation of modern and civilized nations where a bill of indictment is to take the place of a writ of error, and where a mistake is to be tortured into a crime. This bill would be much less objectionable if it provided for securing the rights I have enumerated, and then provided that if this bill was declared unconstitutional in the courts below a writ of error should lie to the Supreme Court. Indeed, I believe that is the law at present, although I am not exactly certain about it. If a cruel or unusual punishment were to be inflicted upon a negro, an exceptional punishment, one which discriminated against him, in a State court, of course either he or his counsel would set up this law as a defense against it, and they would protest that such punishment could not be inflicted. Then it would be for that judge to decide whether this was constitutional or not. If he decided that it was constitutional, of course it would be binding and obligatory on him. If he decided that it was not constitutional, the defendant would have an ample remedy if he was allowed his writ of error.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where is the particular provision of the bill to which the Senator now alludes?

Mr. COWAN. All the way through.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That particular provision is in the imagination of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COWAN. Is there not a provision by which State officers are to be punished?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not State officers especially, but everybody who violates the law. It is the intention to punish everybody who violates the law.

Mr. COWAN. In the first place, all State laws making discriminations are swept away, and in the next place all persons who undertake to execute those laws are made criminals, and that includes the judge, the constable, the sheriff, the marshal, and everybody. That is my reading of it; I may be wrong; I have not had an opportunity of examining the bill thoroughly in all its details.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask the Senator whether the fugitive slave law did not contain a precisely similar provision, and if it was not held good by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. COWAN. The fugitive slave law of 1850 the Senator means. I was always opposed to it, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Supreme Court held it to be constitutional.

Mr. COWAN. That may be; but I say I was always opposed to it; and I had always very grave doubts whether it was good law. Certainly, I never volunteered to execute it, and never made one of a posse comitatus to carry it out, so that I am not much to be put off the track by a reference to the fugitive slave law. If that was a bad law, it is now our province, as it is our high privilege, freed from that incubus which brooded upon the nation so long, to make good laws instead of doubtful measures, such as the fugitive slave law was; and it was doubtful, and it excited more angry animosity among our people, and was perhaps more the cause of the present rebellion, and the excitement which gave rise to it, than any one thing besides. I am opposed to having any more such doubtful legislation, or such legislation as will not be acceptable to the people where the law is to operate.

I may state that I have another objection to this bill at the present time; and that is, that the people of several States in the Union are not represented here, and yet this law is mainly to operate upon those people. I think it would be at least decent, respectful, if we desire to maintain and support this Government on the broad foundation upon which it was laid, namely, the consent of the governed, that we should wait, at any rate, until the people upon whom it is to operate have a voice in these Halls.

I know it is said that those people are not in condition to be allowed representation here. Mr. President, he who says the people are not in condition asserts that this Government is a failure. It rests entirely upon the people, and if the people cannot be trusted anywhere and everywhere throughout it, then it is not the Government we supposed it was, and not the Government it was intended to be. I admit that the American people, like other peoples, are subject to periodical disturbances. They may be led away by the arts of the demagogue, they may be forced away by the power of de facto governments asserted over them; but if they are, the punishment they receive is war. When the question is put, it is put to the arbitrament of the sword. That enters judgment and issues execution at the same stroke; and when the war is over the people are purged. When the war is over it is too late to say that the people are guilty. They have suffered the penalty of their folly, or their crime, or what you may be pleased to call it, and it is time then to talk about individuals, not people. As I said before, the man who assails a whole people assails the very foundation of our Government, the very stones which underlie its corners, and proclaims to the world that the people are not what our ancestors supposed they were, that they lack that virtue necessary to sustain such a Government as this.

Mr. President, that is not true, and it is not true of the southern people to-day. During the war for the rebellion, it was questioned whether after the war was over and after we had suppressed the rebellion the people would respond, whether they would come back again to their allegiance and be part and parcel of the Union as before. I say it was questioned whether they would do so. Have they not done it? The result is a thing of which every American who loves his country and who prides himself in this great Republic should be proud of. If the southern people, after their armies were beaten, after they had lost everything in this game of war, had refused to organize republican governments in unison with the Constitution and the laws, if they had still stubbornly refused to submit, if they had refused to send Representatives to Congress and Senators here, then you might have said that the people were in default and that the people had failed; but in my judgment those people have not failed; they have done, so far as I can observe, everything that the most hopeful or sanguine man could have expected them to do. I am afraid that we confronted with the people of the South another and entirely different class. We are constantly told of the traitors and the rebels of the South; and unquestionably there are traitors and there are rebels there, and I would a great deal rather see them indicted and punished than hear so much about them.

Who are rebels and traitors? Who are guilty men according to the theory of our law? The presumption is, that all men are innocent until they are shown to be guilty. Every line of our law is blazing with the light of that humane sentiment. The words "traitor" and "rebel" are exceedingly glib upon the tongues of certain gentlemen. A few minutes ago, it was alleged here that every man who cannot take the present test oath must necessarily be a rebel or a traitor. Mr. President, if that delusion is persisted in, if that belief is to govern in the councils of this Government, there is an end of the Republic. It is not true in fact, and it is not true in law. Let us see how that is.

In the fall of 1860 a certain number of persons in the southern States proposed secession. How many? Were all the women in it? Were all the children in it? Were all the men of both parties in it? No man who knows anything about the facts dares say any such thing. There were a few conspirators who for thirty years had been weaving their web of treason, and they had procured their election to the high places all through the South. They were in possession of all the departments of the State governments in the South, except in Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri; and by the by at this point let me note that wherever they were not in possession of all the departments of a State government they invariably failed in their scheme of secession.

These conspirators having made themselves governors and legislators and judges, after the election of Mr. Lincoln, at a time when all the people of those communities were mortified, angry, in ill-humor because they had been beaten at a previous election, when Bell men and Douglas men and Breckinridge men were all in the same category, they proposed secession. Did everybody assent to it? I beg gentlemen to read the history. In no State in the Union where the people were consulted fairly, except perhaps one, did the scheme of secession meet with the approbation of the people. Who was to resist secession? Who was to resist the governments of those States when they determined upon it? We hear a great deal about this Government being obliged to guarantee a republican form of government to every State in the Union. Who was the guarantor of those governments? Who was bound to see that they did not go astray into secession and to protect the people as against it? The Government of the United States, and it is well that we note it now; it is well that we turn and look there, because history will record that it was the United States of America that should have protected the people who opposed secession in South Carolina and other States of the South.

Let us see how they did it. The Congress of 1859-60-61 was in session here, and what did it do to protect the people of the seceded States? Did it do as Mr. Lincoln afterward did without an act of Congress, call out the militia? Did its members attempt to throttle the thing in its inception? No, sir, they played at politics here in the Capitol, and the President played at politics at the other end of the avenue, and what was the consequence? The majority of the people of the South, or of the seven cotton States, were left without a single representative of the United States to whom they could look for protection; the United States Government suffered itself ignominiously to be put out of possession of all those States except the two little forts of Pickens and Sumter. I should like gentlemen to tell me what a Union man in Georgia was to do under circumstances of that kind. Do gentlemen pretend that single men, without an organization, without any governmental means, without any of the insignia of power, can stand up and resist the government of a State with all these means in its hands of enforcing its power? Surely not; and there was no other power in this Government except the United States to which they could look, and the United States went out of possession and left those people to the mercy of secession.

Mr. President, for two hundred years at least the doctrine has been established, and established beyond question, that protection and allegiance are reciprocal. I owe allegiance to this Government, and it owes to me protection. If it refuses to protect me, I am not to be punished because I do not yield it allegiance. Let me suppose a delegation of Georgians, of Alabamians, or Mississippians, if you please, Union men, coming here to this capital in the winter of 1860-61, and calling upon Congress, and saying, "South Carolina has actually seceded; other States are about doing the same thing; you should appropriate money and provide means, you should authorize the President to put down that attempted rebellion." What did Congress say? Read the record. They would not trust the President. Then the delegation go to the President, and what does he say? "I cannot coerce a State; I might suppress an insurrection, but I have no means; I have no authority to call out the militia." Anybody that wants to know what Mr. Buchanan has to say on that subject, I recommend him to read Mr. Buchanan's book, recently published, in which his side of the case is put forth. I suppose, with as much strength as it is capable of being.

What were these people to do? I put this to Senators here honestly upon their consciences. What were these loyal men to do who were here at that time: who, when they voted upon the ordinances of secession, and on the calling of conventions to pass those ordinances, invariably voted against them; what were they to do? Just exactly what they did do. They went back and told their people. "There is no help from the United States; they are out of possession; the President is recalcitrant, and Congress is wrangling and refusing to trust him; we cannot have help; we must submit." Then Mr. Lincoln's Government came in, and things were in such a shape that for six weeks the present party in power, of whom Mr. Lincoln was the head, was unable to determine whether or not it would put down that rebellion. There it hung in the balance, a hair almost being sufficient to determine it. It was not determined until the rebels themselves determined it by firing upon Fort Sumter.

And the moment that first gun was fired everybody knew what to do, and there was only one thing to do; nobody could have done anything else. Then we went to put down the rebellion. What for? Was it not to fulfill our guarantee and to do the thing that Mr. Buchanan and the previous Administration ought to have done? Was it to conquer these people? If it was, what right had we to conquer them? Gentlemen frequently refer to the Declaration of Independence, and take from it a very doubtful phrase, of which they make a great deal; but there are phrases in it about which there can be no difference. One of them is, that the right to govern comes from the consent of the governed. We went there because we knew that secession was against the will of the governed there, so far as we could determine. We went there to rescue men who were desirous of standing by the Union and its flag, and not to enslave them. We went there to bring them back to a Government which insured them their rights, and not to a Government which would take those rights away.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend from Pennsylvania a question, with his permission.

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know if I understand the Senator rightly to argue that if all the people of those States had been in favor of secession we should have had no right to interfere with them, but should have been bound to submit to their action.

Mr. COWAN. When that question arises—and I was afraid at one time it would arise—I will answer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But it arises now—

Mr. COWAN. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator argues, if I understand him, that we went there for the simple reason that a large portion, if not the majority of those people, did not wish to secede, and were opposed to secession. Now I put the other side; suppose the whole or about the whole had wished to secede, do I understand him to argue that we should have had no right to go?

Mr. COWAN. The gentleman cannot entrap me off the position on which I stand, and get me to arguing other and very different questions. I will ask the gentleman one question, and perhaps he will answer it. I ask whether you did go there to conquer them, whether you went there to take away their rights or to maintain their rights.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If necessary, in order to suppress the rebellion and restore the power of the Government, certainly to conquer them. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. COWAN. The gentleman has answered his own question, and as he has answered it himself, and I have no quarrel with him, let it pass; but the question does not arise. These people were not, the whole of them, in favor of secession; and I refer the gentleman to a chapter in Mr. Greeley's book, in which the facts on that point are all collated for the benefit of Senators and others, and it is very well done. There were more than one half of them who were opposed to it. What I object to is, that that half should now be branded as criminals when the only thing criminal they did was to get into difficulty and into war, desolation, and destruction, because we, the Government of the United States, did not do our duty in that behalf.

Now, I come to the law. I say this is the law; it is not only common sense; it is not only common reason, common justice, and common humanity, but it is the law, and all legal gentlemen here know that it is the law: if the General Government allows itself to be put out of possession, so that it cannot protect a citizen, and a de facto Government is over him, whatever he does in obedience to that de facto Government, and under its authority, is not treason. Does anybody undertake to deny that that is the law?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Grant it for the sake of argument.

Mr. COWAN. No, but for the sake of the truth. That is the law. Then I say that no man is a traitor who—

Mr. HOWARD. That is your law.

Mr. COWAN. It is the law granted by my friend from Maine, and after I proceed on his grant. I am asked to entertain your denial.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want the Senator to understand me. I want to see what the consequences of the argument would be. Suppose there was a certain portion of them who were forced in; very well; you say they have not committed treason. Grant it for argument sake; suppose we do not punish anybody for treason, does it follow that when the majority have revolted, and we have suppressed the revolt, we must immediately restore to the whole community all the rights that they may have forfeited because some portion of them were not originally in favor of the revolt? Is that the Senator's argument?

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator is getting a little ahead of me. His exceedingly quick and apprehensive intellect stalks in front. I have not said anything about granting them all their rights. I am talking now about the impropriety, the folly, and the madness of assailing a whole people, as traitors and rebels. I am trying to show that more than half of these people, I mean the voting population, can by no possibility be obnoxious to that charge.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the question is whether they are assailed as rebels and traitors because it is deemed unsafe to give them the rights of government, for that is the argument.

Mr. COWAN. That may be; it may come to that; but I am not yet bound to anticipate. I was going on to show what the law was with regard to these things. As I said before, whatever was done by the inhabitants of those States after we were out of possession, and at a time when we could not protect them, whatever was then done in obedience to the confederate government, or to the State government over them, is not to be imputed to them as treason. That is what I mean, and I think that every man of the country ought to be proud, he ought to be desirous to get as many of the people of the South in that category as he could. Do you want to make it out that you live in a community one half of whom are rebels and traitors? If I believed that the community in which I lived was of that texture, so rotten in its nature, and so unworthy of everything that constitutes manhood, I would not stay in the country five minutes. I say I am proud to know that among the southern people in that terrible time of peril and rage and excitement, when all the elements were unloosed, so many of them stood up for their country, its Constitution, and its flag. I cannot conceive what object is to be gained by gentlemen in endeavoring to make it out that the whole mass of them are wanting in anything like that virtue which characterizes and ought to characterize American citizens.

I say that the law is the rule, and for my own part I assail no man South except through the law. We made the war to restore the dominion of the laws, not the dominion of any man, or of any set of men, or of any faction or party. The law is above us all. We made the war because the law had been broken, because the law had been violated; and we made the war to restore it in its majesty; and I say let the law judge, and let him who talks about traitors go into the courts and punish them. If a traitor undertakes to come here, a man that I believe guilty of treason, a man that I believe made war upon the United States at a time when the United States could protect him, and when he was under the authority and power of no other Government, I would take him into the court myself; I should feel it my bounden duty to do so.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like very much to understand as clearly as possible the views of the Senator, who is very confident and very earnest in his assertion of the law of treason. Suppose (what has been the fact) that the government of one of the cotton States had passed completely from the hands of men loyal to the United States into those of traitors; and suppose that the rebel government had in this manner obtained an actual and effectual possession of all the political powers of the rebel State. Suppose such a state of things to have happened; I do not know that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania will admit that that state of things actually happened. I ask him now, suppose one of the ringleaders of the rebellion in this rebel State should be put upon his trial before an impartial court and an impartial jury for the crime of treason committed in that State, whether he could go into court and interpose a plea to an indictment for treason, setting up that the accused was only acting in pursuance of the laws of the State and under the legal compulsion arising from the pressure of those laws, and whether he would regard that plea as a justification for the acts of treason which that accused may have committed. I do not know that I have made myself understood.

Mr. COWAN. I think I understand my friend from Michigan, and I am very free to say that if I do understand him, it would not be a defense. If an original ringleader, a man engaged in the original conspiracy, were to attempt to set up a plea of that kind he would be met at once with the assertion that he was one of the original conspirators.

Mr. HOWARD. Once again, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose that this ringleader is charged with having committed an overt act of treason during the flagrancy of the war, while the ringleader was just as much under the pressure of the State laws of the rebel States as any other person, however humble or subordinate he may have been, would he then suppose that this plea would protect him?

Mr. COWAN. Nothing in the world can be clearer. The plea would not be worth talking about. The original ringleader, the original conspirator, the man who gets up and conceals the plan and is part of the plan, is guilty of everything which is done in pursuance of the plan, not only first, but last, because the whole, in the eye of the law, is a single offense; he would be just as liable for treason for firing his gun at the battle of Gettysburg as he would be for signing a secession ordinance at Charleston on the first day of secession.

Mr. HOWARD. Then, if the Senator will allow me, I will ask him another question. At what point does the guilt of treason commence in the case which I put, and at what point does it become no longer treason?

Mr. COWAN. I will state that to, the honorable Senator, and I thought I had stated it.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not understand it so.

Mr. COWAN. The guilt of treason commences, as I stated before, by making war or contriving war against the Government of the United States at a time when the United States is able to protect him if he refuses, and at a time when there is no de facto Government over him to compel his consent.

Mr. HOWARD. Then treason depends on the ability of the United States to protect the individual.

Mr. COWAN. It may; and I have put a case which should satisfy the honorable Senator from Michigan of that, that it may depend upon it exactly. Let me suppose that his State, with its Governor, Legislature, and judges had seceded, what would he have done? Would he have been guilty of treason if he obeyed that State government of Michigan when the United States could not protect him and was not there to protect him?

Mr. HOWARD. I am perfectly ready to answer that question. I certainly should, in that case, be legally guilty of treason as it is defined by the Constitution of the United States. What might be the proper measure of punishment to inflict upon me under such circumstances would be a matter for the Executive and not for the courts. I suppose that the essence of all crimes consists in the intention, the purpose. In the trial of criminal cases, we inquire into the animus with which the act was done by the accused; and if it appears that the act was not done with an evil intention, that it was done by coercion, or under any circumstances of justification or excuse, we all know very well that the courts charge the jury that that description of evidence is to be received in the mitigation of the crime. But that is not the case which I put. I put the case where the intention is clear, where there is no coercion, where there is no irresistible pressure, but where the act is done in obedience to the command of the laws of the State, or of the proper agents for the execution of those laws.

Mr. COWAN. The only thing which the honorable Senator does not take into account, and which he might take into account as a lawyer, is the presumption of law. If he will take the trouble to turn to the text-books, he will find this much more clearly stated than I can state it. If the citizen of a State acts in obedience to the government of that State, which is a usurped government, even whether it is done willingly or unwillingly, he is excused; treason is not imputed to him. I think the word you will find is "excused," because the law will not presume that a man does willingly that thing which is a crime and which he cannot resist, because the law looks to human frailty, the common weakness of humanity. It does not suppose that a single man is able to resist a State; everybody knows he is not.

Now, I wish to come to the conclusion of my argument. I think it is perfectly clear that the majority of the people of the southern States, and I think the great majority of them, did not commit treason. I very much doubt whether any great mass of people in the world ever did commit treason. We know the people, and we know their weakness. We know how readily they are led away by their leaders; we know how subject they are to have their passions excited, and we know how quickly the flame of war may be kindled among them without the wicked, treasonable intent which is necessary to constitute the offense of treason; and therefore it is that I suppose no Government in the world ever undertook to punish a whole people for treason. All Governments, so far, have treated the leaders as the criminals, not the people. They were never supposed to incur any other penalty than that which fell upon them by the war in which the treason involved them. I have no doubt then, Mr. President, that the great mass of the southern people never were guilty of treason, never could be convicted of treason.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. COWAN. My honorable friend will excuse me; I thought I was done being catechised; I want to finish up, and then anybody that wants to assail what I say can do so. I believe the great mass of the people never have been guilty of treason. I like to believe it, because it gives me assurance of the stability and of the integrity of this Government. I like to believe it, because it enables me to think that we can restore the Union again; it enables me to think that we can have the greatest republic, and not only the greatest republic, but, Mr. President, the greatest empire the world has ever seen. I love to believe it, because, the Union restored, all our foreign difficulty vanishes away into thin air. I love to believe it, because if the Union is restored the public credit is restored and rises with it. If the Union is restored, it is an earnest to the whole world everywhere of man's capacity for self-government. I say again that I like to believe these things. I do believe them, and I take pleasure in it because it is a charitable belief.

A word as to the proper mode of treating these people. I asked a southern gentleman the other day, "Suppose we get into difficulty with England or France, which side would they take?" "Why," said he, "nine out of every ten of them will stand by the flag." Now, Mr. President, that is either true or it is not true. If it is true that nine men out of every ten will stand by the flag, then I say to assail them as rebels and traitors, and to treat them as criminals, and to try to deprive them of the rights they ought to have as inhabitants of free States, as we are, is a gross outrage and one which will recoil upon our heads. If they are not; if they are in the condition which some gentlemen like to represent them as occupying, then, sir, I want to know whether you will bring them to reason, whether you will bring them back to that affection which they ought to have for this Government and its flag, by such bills as this, which invade rights that they of all other people have been taught to consider as peculiarly belonging to the States and not within the province of the Government to invade. Can you bring them back by making laws which operate upon them when they are not here? Can you bring them back by giving them the same cause to rebel against you which Great Britain gave to your ancestors? Can you bring them back here by legislating for them and yet refusing them the right of representation? Can you bring them back by amending the Constitution time and again over their heads when you refuse to listen to their arguments here in the common councils of the country? I say this is worthy of the serious consideration of every man who loves his country; and I put it to my brethren here in the hope that they may think of it in this aspect.

Nay, Mr. President, I know apprehensions are expressed. Apprehensions of what? What can the people of those States do if we treat them fairly and give them all their rights under the laws? What is the worst they can do? Can they rebel again? If they are going to rebel again, you are putting them now exactly in such a condition that they will before the world have good cause. You are putting them precisely in that situation when they can appeal to your enemies for assistance, and when they will get it. When they ask England to protect them the next time, and then when they seek an alliance with France the next time, they will succeed. England will not pay fifty millions more to keep her Lancashire poor from starving when she can control the cotton fields of the southern portion of these United States. France will not much longer be bullied about the Monroe doctrine, when she by joining with the South may help to tear this Republic in two and shear it of its greatness.

Then, I say, if the people would stand by the flag, give them their rights; and I say if they will not stand by it, let us give them their rights and let them do their worst, because they will do it anyway. It is far safer to treat them according to the laws that exist and do now exist without new ones to operate upon them, made while they are not here, far safer than the course we are pursuing. There are guilty people among them. Why are not those guilty people prosecuted? Why are they not punished? If Jefferson Davis is a traitor, we have him in our hands, and why is he not tried and convicted? Where are your district attorneys? Where are your judges? Have you no machinery? Who resists the establishment of courts? Who prevents the marshal from summoning jurors such as the Senator from Nevada described awhile ago? He says that there are plenty of poor men down there who have been oppressed by the slaveholding aristocracy, and who were dragged into this rebellion. That I believe to be true. He says that they would gladly be postmasters, and accept the little offices of the country at our hands. I suppose they would gladly play jurors over this man who they believe has brought such calamities upon their country, and subjected them to such national humiliations. Are there no courts, are there no juries, is there no machinery in the land, by which individuals can be punished, and only machinery by which the innocent, the people, can be tortured and worried, and perhaps driven into another rebellion?

Mr. President, I hope we shall take better counsel. I think it cannot be disguised that just at this moment there is a growing apprehension in the country that something is not right. I do not say that that apprehension has risen to alarm; but I do say that unless this Congress shall do something to reassure the people it will come to that. The soldier is beginning to ask why the country is not restored. He is beginning to ask, "Will it be restored?" He says, "I fought the battles of the country long days and dreary nights through a terrible war for the Union for the purpose of saving the Republic one and indivisible." Why is it not restored? Is there any resistance to this Government, any refusal on the part of the people to put all the machinery in motion? I tell you, Mr. President, when he asks this Congress why it is that all the bands are not tied, and all the means of cementing it are not made use of, there will be a terrible answer from him if he finds that we by our factious course prevent this restoration.

What is it that binds now, I ask, the eleven States lately in rebellion to this Union but the President? He is the only piece of property they have in common with us. He stands like a Colossus across this chasm which it is our business to fill up and close forever. The bondholder, the man who loaned us the money to carry on this war, the man who came up with Fortunatus's purse, almost without stint, to furnish the sinews of it, will begin to ask, why is the Union not restored; where is the obstacle, and what is the obstacle? Will it do to tell him that the hearts of that people are not right? He will tell you that you had better leave that to the means of Christian grace; it will be enough for him if they obey the laws, if they are willing to submit themselves to the laws as other good citizens do. It will not do to assert to him that they are not to be trusted as the people, because he will tell you it was as the people and upon the faith that they as the people would restore the Government that he gave his money. It will not do either to tell him and the soldier, too, that we are going to hold these people as conquered provinces. The soldier will tell you that that will do him no good; he did not fight for conquered provinces; he did not fight to make his fellow-men vassals and serfs; he fought to bring them back to brotherhood and freedom. He wanted to make them to strengthen him and to aid him rather than to be his enemies hereafter. True, he may tell you, "If I were a king or a noble, conquest might be of avail to me, but I am a humble citizen of this Republic, and conquest is not that for which I ventured myself upon the field of battle."

Mr. President, I ought to apologize, perhaps, for leaving the subject-matter of discussion so far behind in this debate: but if I have left it, I beg that all the blame will not be thrown upon me, because part of the time I was not only bound to furnish the argument, but to stand a cross-examination.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that there is a growing apprehension in the country that there is something wrong in the present state of affairs; but I do not propose at this moment to go far into the causes of that wrong. I intend to address myself to the bill under consideration, and not to follow the Senator from Pennsylvania in the devious course which he has pursued.

Undoubtedly there are some things which are wrong, and unfortunately, I think, for some persons, the people have not only "begun" to have an apprehension of that wrong, but actually possess a knowledge of it. It is impossible for us here to raise such a cloud of dust as to blind the vision of the people whom we represent upon these great and important topics. There is a condition of wrong, I apprehend, existing in some of the rebel States, and as one very small bit of evidence of its existence I beg leave to say that I very recently saw a letter written by one of the most eminent of our generals now on duty in the State of Texas, in which he states that at about the time of the date of his letter, last December, such a curiosity was discovered in the northern part of Texas as a true out-and-out Union man; one of the old style of Unionists, who had maintained his integrity throughout the war, and who, after the close of hostilities, was so inconsiderate, so wanting in tenderness toward the patriotic feelings of the people of Texas, as to raise the old stripes and stars over the roof of his house. This was but the signal for a meeting of a committee of the very loyal citizens of that neighborhood, who at once called upon him and ordered him to take down the old flag, stating to him that they could submit to be conquered, that they "accepted the situation," but that for him to stick up the old flag over his house was a little too much for them to bear. He had the resolution, however, to resist the demand; and for that resistance he atoned with his life. He was deliberately murdered by those lovely Unionists of the State of Texas, those reconstructed or semi-reconstructed Unionists, who, like too many other Unionists of the like stamp, "accept the situation!"

I should be very glad to see an exhibit made of the condition of that rebel State of Texas; and I take this occasion to express my regret, as far as I can apprehend the nature of the subject, that the President of the United States should have thought it his duty to withhold from Congress the facts for which he was called upon recently by a resolution. I think it is highly necessary that Congress and the people should be fully informed, and that at as early a day as practicable, of the actual condition, social and political, of the rebel States, so that in adjusting our legislation in reference to them we may act with due regard to their actual condition, with full light and knowledge of the whole subject.

But, sir, I did not rise intending to go into the general subject, but rose more particularly to say a word in reference to the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery, and to the true interpretation to be given to it. I happened to be a member of the Judiciary Committee at the time this amendment was drafted and adopted and reported to the Senate. I recollect very distinctly what were the views entertained by members of that committee at the time it was under consideration before them. And notwithstanding the very vehement style of the Senator from Pennsylvania, in placing a narrow and utterly ineffectual construction upon it, I take this occasion to say that it was in contemplation of its friends and advocates to give to Congress precisely the power over the subject of slavery and the freedmen which is proposed to be exercised by the bill now under our consideration.

It was easy to foresee, and of course we foresaw, that in case this scheme of emancipation was carried out in the rebel States it would encounter the most vehement resistance on the part of the old slaveholders. It was easy to look far enough into the future to perceive that it would be a very unwelcome measure to them, and that they would resort to every means in their power to prevent what they called the loss of their property under this amendment. We could foresee easily enough that they would use, if they should be permitted to do so by the General Government, all the powers of the State governments in restraining and circumscribing the rights and privileges which are plainly given by it to the emancipated negro. If I understand correctly the interpretation given to the article by the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Pennsylvania, it is this: that the sole effect of it is to cut and sever the mere legal ligament by which the person and the service of the slave was attached to his master, and that beyond this particular office the amendment does not go; that it can have no effect whatever upon the condition of the emancipated black in any other respect. In other words, they hold that it relieves him from his so-called legal obligation to render his personal service to his master without compensation; and there leaves him, totally, irretrievably, and without any power on the part of Congress to look after his well-being from the moment of this mockery of emancipation. Sir, such was not the intention of the friends of this amendment at the time of its initiation here and at the time of its adoption; and I undertake to say that it is not the construction which is given to it by the bar throughout the country, and much less by the liberty-loving people.

But let us look more closely at this narrow construction. Where does it leave us? We are told that the amendment simply relieves the slave from the obligation to render service to his master. What is a slave in contemplation of American law, in contemplation of the laws of all the slave States? We know full well; the history of two hundred years teaches us that he had no rights, nor nothing which he could call his own. He had not the right to become a husband or a father in the eye of the law, he had no child, he was not at liberty to indulge the natural affections of the human heart for children, for wife, or even for friend. He owned no property, because the law prohibited him. He could not take real or personal estate either by sale, by grant, or by descent or inheritance. He did not own the bread he earned and ate. He stood upon the face of the earth completely isolated from the society in which he happened to be; he was nothing but a chattel, subject to the will of his owner, and unprotected in his rights by the law of the State where he happened to live. His rights, did I say? No, sir, I use inappropriate language. He had no rights; he was an animal; he was property, a chattel. The Almighty, according to the ideas of the times, had made him to be property, a chattel, and not a man.

Now, sir, it is not denied that this relation of servitude between the former negro slave and his master was actually severed by this amendment. But the absurd construction now forced upon it leaves him without family, without property, without the implements of husbandry, and even without the right to acquire or use any instrumentalities of carrying on the industry of which he may be capable; it leaves him without friend or support, and even without the clothes to cover his nakedness. He is a waif upon the current of time; he has nothing that belongs to him on the face of the earth except solely his naked person. And here, in this state, we are called upon to abandon the poor creature whom we have emancipated. We are coolly told that he has no right beyond this, and we are told that under this amendment the power of the State within whose limits he happens to be is not at all restrained in respect to him, and that the State through its Legislature may at any time declare him to be a vagrant, and as such commit him to jail, or assign him to uncompensated service.

Now, Mr. President, I ask these gentlemen—I appeal not only to their knowledge of the true principles of construction, but I appeal to their humanity—to say whether it is possible innocently and sincerely to ascribe to the advocates of this amendment any such cruel and inhuman purpose as this? No, sir; I think they cannot lay their hands upon their hearts and say that in advocating this amendment we intended to leave the negro in so helpless and destitute a condition. But if theirs be the true construction, then it is competent for the Legislature of each State to declare by law that no negro who has once been a slave shall ever, within the limits of that State, have the right or privilege of earning and purchasing property; of having a home under which to shelter him and his family, if he has one; of having a wife and family, or of eating the bread he earns; thus leaving in the power of these interested States to expatriate him at any moment and drive him beyond their limits; to deprive him of a home, to deprive him of all the fruits of his toil and his industry, and finally to reduce him to a condition infinitely worse than that of actual slavery, by compelling him to labor at such price as the old master may see fit to pay him, while at the same time, he not being a slave, has no claim whatever upon that old master for support, thus treating him as a nuisance upon the face of the earth.

No, sir, such was not the intention of the advocates of this amendment. Its intention was to make him the opposite of a slave, to make him a freeman. And what are the attributes of a freeman according to the universal understanding of the American people? Is a freeman to be deprived of the right of acquiring property, of the right of having a family, a wife, children, home? What definition will you attach to the word "freeman" that does not include these ideas? The once slave is no longer a slave; he has become, by means of emancipation, a free man. If such be the case, then in all common sense is he not entitled to those rights which we concede to a man who is free?

Mr. President, I do not understand the bill which is now before us to contemplate anything else but this, that in respect to all civil rights—and those are some of the civil rights which I have just enumerated—there is to be hereafter no distinction between the white race and the black race. It is to secure to these men whom we have made free the ordinary rights of a freeman and nothing else. Its first section declares that:

The inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding.

There is no invasion of the legitimate rights of the States. It contemplates nothing of the kind; but it simply gives to persons who are of different races or colors the same civil rights. That is its full extent; it goes no further; and I sincerely trust that this nation, having by an expenditure of blood and treasure unexampled in the history of the human race, having by their chief Executive declared the slaves in the United States forever emancipated and free, and in doing this great act appealed to the favor and approval of a just God; having employed this class of persons to the number of nearly two hundred thousand in the prosecution of our just and righteous war, will not now be found so recreant to duty, so wanting in simple justice, as to turn our backs upon the race and say to them, "We set you free, but beyond this we give you no protection; we allow you again to be reduced to slavery by your old masters, because it is the right of the State which has enslaved you for two hundred years thus to do." Sir, let me tell you and the Senators who have advocated the opposite side of this question that if we fail in this high duty, if we fail to redeem this solemn pledge which we have given to the slave, to the world, and in the presence of Almighty God, the time is not far distant when we shall reap the fruits of our treachery and imbecility in woes which we have not yet witnessed, in terrors of which even the civil war that has just passed has furnished no example.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I propose an amendment to the amendment, which has been submitted to the chairman of the committee and has been agreed to by him. It is after the word "Power," in the third line of the amendment, to insert "or tribal authority;" so as to read, "All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power or tribal authority, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States," &c.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that amendment. It will make the amendment I offered more specific. I think it would mean that without it, but still I have no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if this bill is to pass into a law, it is of course advisable—and I am sure no one will admit that with more readiness than the honorable member of the committee who reported it—that it should be as free from objections as it can be made. What I am about to suggest is not, therefore, for the purpose of defeating the bill, though I shall not be able to vote for it with the opinion I entertain on the question of power, but for the purpose of improving the bill, or at least relieving it from objections to which it seems to me to be now subject.

The particular question before the Senate is the amendment suggested by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, as now amended by the honorable member from Kansas. By that amendment he proposes to define citizenship. Nobody is more willing to admit that it is very desirable that such a definition should be given. Since the decision in the case of Dred Scott, as the Senate are aware, a person of African descent, whether born free or not, whether free by birth or free by after events, is not, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, a citizen.

Whatever objections may be made to that decision, with reference to the great question which was decided and the question which agitated the country far and wide, cannot be made to that part of the decision which relates to the particular point which I have just stated. The objection to the decision upon the great question was that that was not before the court for adjudication. The suit was instituted in a State court of Missouri, and afterward went into the circuit court of the United States, and was brought, by writ of error, from the decision of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States. There were two questions. The first was whether Scott was a citizen of the United States within the meaning of the third article of the Constitution, which creates and defines the extent of the judicial power. The act of 1789 could not go further, perhaps, than the Constitution provided. The Senate will remember that by that third article the judicial power of the United States was made to extend to, among other cases, controversies existing between citizens of different States. It was very clear, therefore, that no one could be considered as embraced by that power except a person who should be a citizen of the United States. The point was made in the court below, and upon the writ of error to the Supreme Court six judges out of eight, I think, decided that Scott was not a citizen; and not being a citizen, that the court below had no jurisdiction to try the cause.

The Supreme Court, however, went on afterward, for reasons satisfactory to the majority, to decide the questions which arose upon the merits, as they must have decided them if they had sustained the point of jurisdiction.

As far as the decision upon the merits was concerned, it was held to be obnoxious to very serious objection, and perhaps a large majority of the people of the United States, including a great many of the members of the profession throughout the United States, were of opinion that when the court came to the conclusion that they had no jurisdiction because of the incapacity of the party to sue, all that they should have done was to affirm the judgment of the court below upon the ground of want of jurisdiction. But as the Senate will see, the very point whether an African, free or not free born, free or becoming free afterward by State manumission or by manumission given him by his owner, was a citizen of the United States, was before that court and was adjudicated.

Now, without saying where the question has presented itself to my mind, it is sufficient for my purpose to say that I have been exceedingly anxious individually that there should be some definition which will rid this class of our people from that objection. If the Supreme Court decision is a binding one and will be followed in the future, this law which we are now about to pass will be held of course to be of no avail, as far as it professes to define what citizenship is, because it gives the rights of citizenship to all persons without distinction of color, and of course embraces Africans or descendants of Africans.

My own opinion, therefore, is that the object can only be safely and surely attained by an amendment of the Constitution, and I have tried in vain to form such a provision as would be free from objection. Whether I or those who may be associated with me in the future will be able to adopt a definition free from all objection is perhaps doubtful; but at any rate the effort can be made, and will be made in good faith; but I am very much afraid that, so far from settling the question by this legislation, we shall find that if the legislation is adopted the matter will be just as open to controversy as it was before.

There is another observation with which I beg leave to trouble the Senate, for the reason that, as I have just stated, I individually have found very great difficulty in saying who is a citizen. It is a question about which there is as much doubt as upon any other question in relation to which there is any doubt. How those doubts are to be solved, how the definition shall be made so plain as to be apparent to the comprehension of everybody, is with me now a problem. I am afraid, even supposing that we have the authority to do it by legislation, that the manner in which it is proposed to accomplish it by my friend from Illinois will not effect the purpose.

A word now upon the bill only in one particular. Nobody I am sure with whom it has been my happiness to associate during this war and who knows how anxious I have been from the first that the institution of slavery should be abolished, will doubt that from the same motives (whether they be of humanity or of some policy founded on other considerations than mere considerations of humanity) I should be equally anxious that the colored race should be protected in all their rights; that is to say in all proper rights.

The honorable member from Illinois yesterday—I have not the book by me—referred to a decision of Mr. Justice Washington as reported I think in 4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports; but if I heard him distinctly he did not read the whole of that decision. He read that portion of it alone which he supposed bore upon the particular question before the Senate; but I think it will be found that another portion of it which succeeds the particular part that he did read, will not justify him in finding a warrant for this bill in the opinion of Mr. Justice Washington. The case, if I remember it, arose upon an objection to the constitutionality of some of the State laws of New Jersey in relation to their fishing and their oysters. It was insisted that under the clause of the Constitution which secures to the citizens of each State the rights and privileges of citizens of the several States where ever they shall go, a citizen of New York had the right to go into New Jersey and catch fish and dredge for oysters. New Jersey denied it. The decision in that case was that New Jersey's title to the oysters and to the fish was exclusive, that she could legislate on the subject as she thought proper, and that she could therefore deny to the citizens of New York the privilege of catching fish or of dredging for oysters. He goes on to give the reasons why the particular rights which were involved in that case were not in the judgment of the court "fundamental rights." He first states what, in the view of the court, were rights of the latter description, and then goes on to say that this right of property is not one of those fundamental rights which is secured by the clause of the Constitution the interpretation of which was before the court in that case.

Now, Mr. President, the right of a State to its fisheries and to its oyster beds within its territorial limits is no greater than the right of the State to its real estate, its land within the same limits; and it has been the universal decision that the mode of purchasing land, the mode of conveying land, and the right to purchase were all within the jurisdiction of the State in which the subject of the purchase was located. Now, if I understand this bill, it is not confined to persons of African descent. The language of the first part of the first section is:

That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery.

That is to say, that no State shall discriminate at all between any inhabitants within her limits on account of any race to which they may belong, whether white or black, on account of color, if they are not white, or on account of their having been previously in a state of slavery, so that the white as well as the black is included in this first section; and if this passes, and we have the authority to pass it, then it would be impossible, as I think, for any State in the Union to draw any distinction as between her citizens who have been there from birth or who have been residents there for any length of time, and he who comes into the State now for the first time as a foreigner; he becomes an "inhabitant." If he comes from England or from any of the countries of the world and settles in the State of Illinois, that moment he becomes an inhabitant, and being an inhabitant, if this bill is to pass in the shape in which it stands, he can buy, he can sell, he can hold, and he can be inherited from.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, that is the law of Illinois to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may be; but it is not necessarily the law of Illinois. That is the law of Illinois, and Illinois has a right to make it her law; but I am speaking now of the question of power. Illinois has a right now to repeal that law. What Illinois has done has not been done by a great many of the States, or perhaps by a majority of the States. They will not permit aliens to purchase or to hold, or if they do, they do not permit others to inherit through them. It is subject now in all the States as far as I am aware—in the absence of legislation I am sure it must be so—to escheat at the instance of the Government.

But that is not all. That observation applies to everybody, without distinction of color or without reference to their antecedent condition; but in terms we are not left to infer that it was not intended to apply it to the blacks, because that is its chief provision, and no doubt is the provision for which the bill was supposed to be necessary. I take it for granted that neither the honorable member from Illinois nor any other member of the Senate would perhaps have thought it necessary to introduce such a bill as this but for the condition in which the blacks are; so that the object of the bill is mainly to provide for the case of blacks. Now, what does it do? There exists in the States of the Union, and there must exist in every Government clothed with the power of governing well and of preserving the peace and harmony of society, a police power; there exists a power to legislate in relation to the prejudices of the people, a power not to legislate against their prejudices. Everybody knows that if a Legislature blindly legislates upon a subject which is obnoxious to the whole community that is subject to its power for a time, it is an act of no practical importance. How has it been in the eastern States with regard to the fugitive slave law of 1850? I mention it not with a view to find fault with the feeling on the subject that has existed in what have been called the free States.

The original fugitive slave law of 1793, which was passed at the instance of General Washington, was of itself very obnoxious at the time to a great many; but the author of the law of 1850—I do not like to name him, because I am willing for his sake, that his name in that connection should be forgotten—admitted, as we have it from the authority of Mr. Clay, that he had made that law as obnoxious as he could in order to prevent its being observed in the States where slavery did not exist, and he accomplished his purpose. The law in one or two instances was enforced in one sense, but how enforced? Enforced by power, by military or civil power, threatening upon each occasion when resort was had to it to involve the particular community where the attempt was made in civil strife and bloodshed. The result was that no man who lost a slave, unless he wanted to make it the subject of political agitation in the South, dreamed of going to the North to recover him; it could not be done. Even the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] here upon the floor of the Senate, as he has over and over admitted, said that he was not a dog, and not being a dog, he would not comply with the provisions of that law; and he spoke, no doubt, the sentiment of a large proportion of the people of Massachusetts, and perhaps what is the universal opinion of the people of that State at this moment and of all the loyal States. The law, therefore, became a dead letter, not because Congress had not the authority to pass it, for, as was stated just now in debate, the Supreme Court by a unanimous decision ruled that that law was constitutional, and Mr. Webster, whose feelings were all the other way no doubt, and who said his feelings were all the other way, admitted in his celebrated speech of the 7th of March that it was a constitutional law, however much he regretted its provisions.

I mention that for the purpose of applying it to one of the provisions of this bill. What is to be its application? There is not a State in which these negroes are to be found where slavery existed until recently, and I am not sure that there is not the same legislation in some of the States where slavery has long since been abolished, which does not make it criminal for a black man to marry a white woman, or for a white man to marry a black woman; and they do it not for the purpose of denying any right to the black man or to the white man, but for the purpose of preserving the harmony and peace of society. The demonstrations going on now in your free States show that a relation of that description cannot be entered into without producing some disorder. Do you not repeal all that legislation by this bill? I do not know that you intend to repeal it; but is it not clear that all such legislation will be repealed, and that consequently there may be a contract of marriage entered into as between persons of these different races, a white man with a black woman, or a black man with a white woman? If you are prepared to repeal it, do you think that the repeal will answer any practical purpose? Are you not, on the contrary, rather inclined to believe that, like the fugitive slave law of 1850, if enforced at all, and if these parties are to be protected at all, it must be enforced and the protection must be given by the bayonet? Is not that the effect of the law? Still confining myself to the first section, it says that these parties, without distinction of color, "shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts," to make contracts of any and every description.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where is the discrimination against color in the law to which the Senator refers?

Mr. JOHNSON. There is none; that is what I say; that is the very thing I am finding fault with.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This bill would not repeal the law to which the Senator refers, if there is no discrimination made by it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Would it not? We shall see directly. Standing upon this section, it will be admitted that the black man has the same right to enter into a contract of marriage with a white woman as a white man has, that is clear, because marriage is a contract. I was speaking of this without reference to any State legislation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He has the same right to make a contract of marriage with a white woman that a white man has with a black woman.

Mr. JOHNSON. Just wait a moment. My friend from Maine is so quick that he cannot wait for the operation of slower minds. If there were no laws in Maryland on the subject, then the black man could marry a white woman, but there are laws. What is the effect of those laws? The first section of this bill says that there is to be no discrimination. The second section says that "any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject or cause to be subjected any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment," shall be proceeded against under this bill. Now, there is a State law which says to the black man, "You shall not marry a white woman," and says to the white man, "You may." There is therefore in Maryland one law in relation to this question for the white man, and another law for the black man. The black man marries a white woman and we try to enforce our laws against him. We say to him, "You have done an illegal act, you have offended against the legislation of Maryland by marrying a white woman." He says, "I have done no such thing; I would have done it but for the legislation of Congress; I would have been liable to trial and conviction but for the legislation of Congress; but I set up the legislation of Congress; you may tell me you are prosecuting me under a law of the State of Maryland which makes it a crime in me, but Congress says that that State legislation shall be of no avail; the law of Maryland in reference to the question is at an end." It means that if it means anything. If the honorable member does not mean that he can change the language. I do not understand my friend from Maine or the honorable member from Illinois himself as denying that, looking to the provisions in the first section, supposing there was no law in Maryland on the subject—and I single out Maryland merely for the purpose of illustration—the contract of marriage would be embraced. White and black are considered together, put in a mass, and the one is entitled to enter into every contract that the other is entitled to enter into. Of course, therefore, the black man is entitled to enter into the contract of marriage with a white woman; but the law of Maryland prevents it; the law of Maryland punishes him for attempting it; and when the man is tried for having violated the law of Maryland, the court will say, "How is the prosecution to be supported under any law of Maryland—that law which is inconsistent with the provisions of the first section of this law of Congress, and the second section of which provides, virtually, that he who prevents a black man from marrying a white woman under any law of Maryland is to be subject to the penalties imposed by it?" That is the way I understand it. I do not think I can be wrong.

But whether I am wrong or not, upon a careful and correct interpretation of the provisions of these two sections, I suppose all the Senate will admit that the error is not so gross a one that the courts may not fall into it. Then what is the result? The whole of this legislation to be found in almost every State in the Union where slavery has existed, and to be found, I believe, in several of the other States, is done away with. You do not mean to do that. I am sure the Senate is not prepared to go to that extent; and I submit to the honorable chairman, without proclaiming myself to be right beyond all possible question of doubt, which would be in bad taste, and certainly very far from what I am disposed to do when I find that a different opinion is entertained by two gentlemen whose opinions I hold in so much respect—I submit to the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether he had not better make it so plain that the difficulty which I suggest in the execution of the law will be obviated.

But to come back to the amendment that is now before the Senate; I do not know what will be the effect of the amendment upon the Indians. The honorable member from Kansas [Mr. LANE] supposes he avoids the difficulty which he thinks would have existed under the original amendment by inserting the words, "or tribal authority." First, what would be the meaning of the amendment without those words? I understood the honorable chairman of the committee to say that these Indians are not citizens of the United States, and never have been. That is a mistake, as I think. The Indian tribes upon that portion of the American continent that belonged to Great Britain were always subject to the dominion of England. England could have done what she thought proper to do with them, but all she did in the execution of that, her sovereign right, was to prohibit them from entering into any contracts in relation to their lands with any other nation than England or the dependencies of England. When we obtained our independence, the whole authority that England had over the tribes became vested in the United States; and since then the uniform view that has been taken of the relation in which these Indians stand to the United States is, that they are but the wards of the United States. They have no sovereign power whatever; they are not a nation in the general acceptance of that term; they cannot sell their lands without the authority of the United States; they are not at liberty to sell their lands to anybody but to citizens of the United States, and under such regulations as the United States may impose.

If the honorable member will refresh his memory by consulting the case of Worcester vs. The State of Georgia, reported in 6 Peters, I think, he will find that Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, who gave the opinion of the court, deciding that the legislation of Georgia or the acts of Georgia were unconstitutional, admits that the Government of the United States could do with the Indians, as far as the question of power was concerned, just what it thought proper; that the absolute dominion was in the United States; the possessory title, with a quasi dominion, was with the Indians, but that quasi dominion was only that they could sell their lands and were not subject to be taxed by the United States, but only because the United States themselves had agreed that they should have those rights; but it was not pretended in that case that they were not citizens of the United States. The result, therefore, would be that an Indian child, born within the territorial limits of these tribes, would be a citizen of the United States, because the territory is part of the United States. Nobody ever doubted that the whole of the Indians who are subject to our control are now located upon territory belonging to the United States, and the result would necessarily follow, so far as citizenship depends upon birth, that, if you make it depend upon birth, the child who is born within the territorial limits of the United States, whether that portion be or be not within the temporary or partial control of the Indians, would be a citizen of the United States. Would the suggestion made by my friend from Kansas obviate it? The language of the amendment as proposed is, "all persons born in the United States." That would certainly include the Indians if I am right in saying the Indian country is part of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. "And not subject to any foreign Power."

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not come to that. You and the Senator from Maine are always too fast for me. "Born in the United States"—I suppose that it will be admitted that that will include them—"and not subject to any foreign Power." The amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas is to add the words, "or tribal authority."

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Does not that restrict it?

Mr. JOHNSON. It does to a certain extent, but does it go as far as you want it to go?

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask the Senator whether we do not always deal with the Indians through the treaty-making power?

Mr. JOHNSON. We have done so, but not necessarily.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it not the habit?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly it is; but I am dealing with it now as a question of power. We have dealt with them as a treaty-making power, but it is not because there ever was a doubt that Congress could deal with them by legislation; and, in point of fact, although we have dealt with them as a treaty-making power, we have done so by making them make the treaty. It is no treaty-making power in the ordinary acceptance of the term; that is to say, the parties are not equal.

Mr. SUMNER. With the Senator's permission, I will remind him that we act upon our treaties with the Indians in this Chamber with precisely the same forms that we do upon our treaties with the European Powers, and they must be ratified by a vote of two thirds of this body.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that; but what I mean to say is, and I do not think the honorable member will contradict me, that there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States defining the treaty-making power, or in any other branch of it, which says that Congress cannot legislate in regard to them. That is what I mean to say. Now to what period does the phrase, "not subject to any foreign Power or tribal authority" relate? Does it mean at the time of the birth, or the time the controversy arises? My friend from Illinois seems to think, and perhaps he is right, that it means the time of the birth; but it admits of a different interpretation. "All persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power or tribal authority shall be citizens of the United States"—when?

Mr. TRUMBULL. When born.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that that is your interpretation.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That is not the way I want it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is not; that is the reason that I suggest it. My friend from Kansas has a very clear perception upon all matters, particularly those relating to the Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, I will state the reason why I do not want it so to apply. A large portion of our Indians have recently taken allotments of land, and our supreme court have decided, as I understand—I have not seen the decision—that the act of accepting the allotments makes them citizens so far as to subject the allotments to taxation. Now, what I desire of the Senate is that the Indians who have taken the allotments and thereby separated themselves from the tribal authority may become citizens of the United States. My colleague and myself have consulted on the subject, and we think it wise legislation that they may have the privilege of holding these allotments and selling them. That is the object.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member does not suppose that I am opposed to that. I admit with him that those Indians who have separated themselves from their tribes, and have acquired lands in the State of Kansas, or anywhere else, ought to be citizens. The only question is whether you have done it by this provision. I throw it out as a suggestion that may or may not have weight, just as the Senate may think it entitled to weight or not. If my friend, the chairman of the committee, is right in his construction of the clause, that it means the time of the birth, then the honorable member from Kansas will not have effected his purpose. I think I can satisfy the Senator that he is quite short of his designed mark, provided the honorable chairman is right—and perhaps he is, I rather think he is—in his interpretation of his amendment, that it means to refer to the date of the birth as the time when the foreign allegiance exists.

The honorable member from Kansas makes the allegiance or tribal authority take the same date. Then the Indians whom you want to make citizens and who have recently come to Kansas, and who have purchased land, but who were born under tribal authority, will not become citizens unless it be by treaty; and that cannot be true so far as citizenship of the United States is concerned, where they become citizens by buying lands in Kansas. If they are aliens before they buy the land, and nothing is done by them to obtain the character of citizens except buying the land, then they do not become citizens; that is very clear. They can only become citizens by a bill like this, which will provide in words for such cases as exist in Kansas; and I think they ought to be provided for.

Mr. COWAN. Will it not have to be a uniform law under the Constitution?

Mr. JOHNSON. It would be uniform of course with reference to those buying lands in any State and separating themselves from their tribes.

Mr. COWAN. But not as to all people—Irishmen, Germans, Indians, and everybody.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is uniformity with a vengeance; but that is not the uniformity which the Constitution renders necessary, if I understand it. One or two of my friends on this side of the Chamber who have spoken seem to suppose that this citizenship cannot be obtained through the legislation of Congress. I entertain a different opinion. The clause in the Constitution to which reference has been made—one of the provisions of the eighth section of the first article—gives to Congress the right to establish uniform laws of naturalization; and the view taken of the effect of that clause, considered in connection with the whole Constitution, is that they cannot become citizens in any other way. That is not true. How did the residents of Louisiana at the time of the cession in 1803, and the residents of Florida at the time of the cession of 1819, become citizens of the United States? It was by treaty. The treaties in those cases provided that all the inhabitants of the ceded territory should be entitled in the United States to the same privileges, immunities, and rights that belonged to the citizens of the United States. No naturalization was ever supposed to be necessary in those cases, and none of those inhabitants have since applied for naturalization; and they have been in the courts time after time and recognized as citizens.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator whether that was not done by treaty; whether it can be done in any other way except according to some uniform rule which is to operate equally upon all people?

Mr. JOHNSON. That rule in relation to Louisiana could not be considered uniform, because it did not provide in relation to all Territories afterward to be acquired; it only covered that case. That, however, is a question which I am not now discussing. I understood the argument to be that the only way in which a person born abroad could become a citizen of the United States was through the naturalization power, so to speak; that Congress must exercise by legislation the power conferred upon that body of establishing a uniform rule of naturalization. Now, in the case which I have stated, as I suppose my friend will admit, it was done not by that means, but by the treaty-making power.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator mean to say that we acquired Texas by treaty? Did we acquire Texas by treaty, and make its citizens citizens of the United States by treaty?

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not say so. I said Louisiana and Florida, not Texas.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought the Senator included Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir, I did not refer to Texas. It was proposed at one time to acquire Texas by treaty, but it was subsequently annexed by joint resolution of the two Houses. That establishes the precedent which I was about to suppose might be established under the Constitution. The citizens of Texas, who of course were aliens, it has never been doubted became citizens of the United States by the annexation of Texas; and that was not done by treaty, it was done by legislation. If the power was in Congress by legislation to make citizens of all the inhabitants of the State of Texas, why is it not in the power of Congress to make citizens by legislation of all who are inhabitants of the United States and who are not citizens? That is what this bill does, or what it proposes to do. There are within the United States millions of people who are not citizens, according to the view of the Supreme Court of the United States. Ought they to be citizens? I think they ought. I think it is an anomaly that says there shall not be the rights of citizenship to any of the inhabitants of any State of the United States.

While they were slaves it was a very different question; but now, when slavery is terminated, and by terminating it you have got rid of the only obstacle in the way of citizenship, two questions arise: First, whether that fact itself does not make them citizens? Before they were not citizens, because of slavery, and only because of slavery. Slavery abolished, why are they not just as much citizens as they would have been if slavery had never existed? My opinion is that they become citizens, and I hold that opinion so strongly that I should consider it unnecessary to legislate on the subject at all as far as that class is concerned, but for the ruling of the Supreme Court to which I have adverted. They held that the Constitution of the United States in no part of it in which the word citizen was used was intended to embrace the African; or to state it still more strongly, but not more strongly than the court stated it, they held that, looking to the contemporaneous history and to the contemporaneous legislation of the several States at the time the Constitution was adopted, the use of the word "citizen" as employed in that Constitution was to exclude the African.

Mr. COWAN. And every other race but the white.

Mr. JOHNSON. Every race but the white—to exclude the African. That decision stands unreversed. Nobody can say that it will be reversed. It is the decision of the highest court to which we are bound to submit with all proper deference, not binding upon us perhaps as legislating in very many particulars; but still, after such a decision has been pronounced, it is our duty, as I think, to avoid its results if we think that decision in the present state of the country would produce mischievous results, by providing that these people, notwithstanding their African descent, shall be citizens of the United States now that they are free.

As to the propriety of passing the bill itself, that is another question. I do not propose now, nor perhaps at any time, to trouble the Senate with any remarks upon the question of the propriety of the passage of the bill. According to my views, which I may or may not explain, if there shall be time at some future period in the session, I think we have not the power to pass this bill; but conceding that the power exists, what I desire, as I hope I shall ever desire, is that the Senators who think they have the power to pass the bill should make it as acceptable and as free from doubt as their wisdom will allow them to do.

Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor.

Mr. COWAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. I hope my friend from Kentucky will acquiesce in that motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the honorable Senator to allow me to offer some papers before that motion is put. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. COWAN. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, touching the equalization of bounties of soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRINNELL, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, in favor of granting to the Thirty-seventh ("Grey-beards") regiment of Iowa volunteers the same bounties which have been granted to other regiments; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL ROUTE IN IOWA.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, for the establishment of a mail route in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REBEL PIRATE SHENANDOAH.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States, with accompanying papers:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant, asking for information in regard to the surrender of the rebel pirate vessel called the Shenandoah, I transmit a report from the Acting Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1866.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to refer the message, with accompanying documents, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that the same be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENLISTMENT OF HUNDRED DAYS MEN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Provost Marshal General in regard to the enlistment of hundred days men, and all orders in relation thereto, in response to a resolution of the House of January 25, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVILEGES OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, William Byers, G. H. Kyle, and James M. Johnson, from the State of Arkansas, be invited to occupy seats in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DELANO. My object is not to make any remarks upon the resolution I have offered, but simply to extend to the gentlemen from Arkansas the same courtesy that has been extended to the gentlemen from Tennessee.

Mr. KELLEY. Is this resolution now subject to debate?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent. The House is now acting under the previous question, which was seconded on yesterday.

Mr. KASSON. Would it be in order for me to inquire of the mover of this resolution if these gentlemen are and have been loyal?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order at this time.

The question was upon agreeing to the resolution, and there were—ayes 53, noes 68.

Mr. DELANO. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 94, not voting 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Darling, Davis, Dawson, DeFrees, Delano, Denison, Eckley, Ezlestone, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Hill, Ho San, Claes, ter D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, LeBlond, Marshall, McCullough, Miller, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Orth, Phelps, Radford, Saincup, J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Smith, Stillwell, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Winfield, and Wright—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Broomall, Reader, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Culom, Dixon, Donnelly, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Ketcham, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, Melndoe, McKee, McLean, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L.

Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—94.
NOT VOTING. Messrs. Ancona, Blaine, Blow, Bandy, Chandler, Culver, Deming, Driggs, Dumont, Grinnell, Harris, Henderson, Demas Hubbard, James Humphrey, Jones, Julian, Kelso, Marston, Marvin, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Voorhees, and Whaley—24.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. TAYLOR said, my colleague, Mr. JONES, is confined to his room by sickness.

At the conclusion of the call of the roll,

Mr. BIDWELL said, I voted "ay" under the impression that this House was going to be consistent, and to allow the gentlemen from Arkansas to come upon this floor on the ground that they were loyal, as they did in the case of the gentlemen from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BIDWELL. I change my vote to "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as stated above.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 86) making additional appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, and moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order for Tuesday, February 6, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

CENSUS OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. LAFLIN reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution:

Resolved, That twenty thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of this House, giving a tabular statement of all manufactures in the United States, be printed for the use of the members.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF LAST CONGRESS.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in the nature of a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a copy of the Rock Island Weekly Argus, published in Illinois, which contains the following statement:

"THE ENORMOUS EXPENSES OF THE REPUBLICAN CONGRESS.—As an example of the wasteful prodigality of the last Republican Congress, we may state that it is admitted that the printing alone for it cost last year over two hundred million dollars."

Now, sir, even supposing that this statement was unintentionally exaggerated by a mistake of the printer, and that the amount intended to be stated was $2,000,000, (a supposition that is not very probable, as the amount is printed in words, not in figures,) it is due to the last Congress to state that even the latter amount is far beyond the truth. The Committee on Printing, through the chairman of that committee in the Senate, has made a demand upon the Superintendent of Public Printing for a tabular statement, which will be placed in the possession of every member of the House. For my present purpose it is sufficient to state that the expenditures for printing for the last Congress, including both the Senate and the House, amounted to $700,618 53, less than one half the amount stated in this paper, even supposing that there was an unintentional mistake in the figures.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, it was no mistake.

Mr. LAFLIN. Of this sum of $700,618 53, the amount for the House of Representatives is a little over $421,000; the amount for the Senate, $279,000. This is all that I have to say.

Mr. STEVENS. I now demand the regular order.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment. I desire simply to offer a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

CONDITION OF THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report of the committee to investigate the condition of the Indian tribes be printed, and that six thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. This resolution will be referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction consider the expediency of proposing the following several propositions to each of the States lately in rebellion, for adoption by the Legislatures or conventions thereof, as a fundamental compact between each of said States and the United States, irrevocable without mutual consent:

First. No ordinance, regulation, or law shall ever be adopted by or have force within said State, which shall cause, intend, or permit the secession or withdrawal of said State, or of the citizens thereof, from the Union of these States; or the release of the officers or people of said State from their obedience to the Constitution of the United States of America; or from their allegiance to the constitutional Government thereof.

Second. The right to bring and defend suits in all the courts of said State, and to give testimony therein, according to the usual course of law, shall be enjoyed on equal terms by all persons resident therein, irrespective of race or color; and all forfeitures, penalties, and liabilities under any law, in any criminal or other proceeding, for the punishment of any crime or misdemeanor, shall be applied to and shall bear upon all persons equally, without any distinction of race or color.

Third. The right to acquire, hold, and dispose of property, real, personal, and mixed, shall, in said State, be enjoyed on equal terms by all naturalized citizens and by all persons native-born, without distinction of race or color.

Fourth. No law, ordinance, or regulation shall be adopted in said State, recognizing or creating any debt or liability on the part of said State, or of any municipal or corporate authority within the jurisdiction thereof, on account of credit, money, material, supplies, personal services, or other consideration whatsoever, taken by or furnished to or for the aid of any government or authority, or pretended government or authority, or military or naval force, or military or naval or civil officer, or pretended officer, heretofore set up, or acting in hostility to the Government of the United States, or so to be set up hereafter; but all such liabilities shall be void; and no tax shall ever be imposed, assessed, or collected by any authority within said State on account thereof.

Mr. LOAN objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection, and the resolution was received and referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

INTERNAL REVENUE REPORT.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and, under the rules, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed six thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, two thousand for the use of the House, and four thousand for the use of the office of the internal revenue.

CURRENCY.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That this House will cooperate with the Secretary of the Treasury in his efforts to bring the currency of the country to a specie basis.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of the following joint resolution reported by the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. LE BLOND to refer the joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, as it is evident I shall not have an opportunity to make the speech I designed on the pending subject, I ask, by unanimous consent, that I shall be allowed to write it and print it in the debates.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

[The speech will be published in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The previous question was seconded last evening, and the question is now, Shall the main question be now ordered to be put?

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the demand for the previous question will be withdrawn, and that by common consent the amendment be referred to the committee on reconstruction without instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can get at that by moving to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. STEVENS. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I now withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays on his motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the yeas and nays are ordered, I desire to say that I hope this subject will be referred to the committee on reconstruction without instructions. That seems to be the desire of the House, and the committee have no objection. I hope that at least the friends of the measure will vote in that way.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 133, not voting 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, McEuer, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, Windell, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Engleton, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James E. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—133.

NOT VOTING. Messrs. Ancona, Barker, Culver, Driggs, Dumont, Henderson, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Noell, Sitgreaves, and Strouse—12.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to refer the subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to recommit the joint resolution to the committee on reconstruction without instructions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the motion to recommit; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have an additional amendment which I did propose to offer to the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. CONKLING. I propose that the House allow gentlemen to submit their various propositions to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to any gentleman submitting resolutions to the Clerk to-day to go to the committee on reconstruction? The Chair hears no objection. Gentlemen can submit their propositions to the Clerk to-day and they will go to the committee.

ALEXANDER W. MCCONNELL.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Alexander W. McConnell; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

DAMAGES IN REBEL STATES.

The SPEAKER announced as the next business in order the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. DELANO from the Committee of Claims, on the 18th of January, Mr. DELANO being entitled to the floor.

Mr. DELANO. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, the Committee of Claims be instructed to reject all claims referred to them for examination by citizens of any of the States lately in rebellion, growing out of the destruction or appropriation of, or damage to, property by the Army or Navy while engaged in suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. DELANO. The House have listened to the reading of the resolution. It proposes a plan of action for the committee in reference to all claims for damages growing out of the rebellion in the States lately in rebellion, including not only damages that result from the necessary ravages of war, but also from appropriations of property by our Army and Navy for subsistence and supplies. The committee are very clearly of opinion that it would be disastrous to the interests of the Government to undertake to pay the first class of damages that I have alluded to, namely, damages growing out of and resulting from the ravages of war. The committee are also unanimously of opinion that no claim rests upon the Government by the former usage of the country or by the law of nations for the payment of such damages.

I do not deem it necessary, taking it for granted that the House has listened to the reading of the report of the committee, to go into an argument to show that there is no responsibility resting upon Congress to pay those damages that are the result of the necessary ravages of war. I know that a Government may assume to pay those damages in the feeling of extreme justice, or of even-handed justice, if it has the ability to do it. But if gentlemen will look at the magnitude of the ravages of the war—ravages which have been rendered necessary in order to make the war a success—and will also consider the enormous expense that this Government has been put to, and the large accumulation of debt incurred, they will see that to heap upon the Government now the additional liability resulting from the assumption of those damages would be an act of injustice to our constituents. It would result, I think, in shaking the credit of the nation. It would place us in a condition of liability, I imagine, vastly beyond our capacity of endurance.

These are simply statements, not arguments in detail, and I trust they are such statements as will be appreciated by the House without attempting to enforce them by details. I rely upon common knowledge of the facts in connection with the putting down of the rebellion to sustain me and to sustain the committee in its conclusion; so that I do not propose to detain the House by pressing this view of the subject upon their consideration. It could be elaborated, but it must certainly be an act of supererogation to attempt its elaboration before this House.

Now, in regard to the next principle embraced in this resolution, which excludes from payment damages resulting from the appropriation of property by our Army for subsistence and for support, the committee are very well aware that this question stands upon a different basis. For I think I might admit with safety, that, according to the usage of nations and the law of nations and the previous practice of this Government, the Government should assume to pay in ordinary cases for damages that have resulted from the taking, appropriation, and use of property for the subsistence of the Army. But the committee have considered this matter and desire the House to consider it in the passage of this resolution. This class of damages is also very large. It will be found to be much larger than gentlemen would be likely to apprehend upon first directing their attention to it. The long occupation of the States in rebellion by our armies, and the necessity of subsisting those armies off the country—a necessity forced upon the Government—occasioned the appropriation of an immense amount of property.

Now, sir, the largest portion of this property belonged to men whose hands were red with the blood of our citizens, and who were desirous of overthrowing our Government. Nobody, I apprehend, will entertain the idea for a single moment of paying that class of men. Those men whose purposes were treason, whose design was the death of the nation, are entitled to no consideration that should lead us to indemnify them for their losses. It was necessary to cause these losses. They fought this rebellion with such vigor and persistence that it became necessary for us to destroy their means in order to put down their power. We did so; and in doing so we were compelled not only to lay our hands upon the guilty, but upon many occasions to lay them upon the innocent, in the appropriation of this class of property. Now, if it were a practicable thing to draw a line of discrimination between the guilty and the innocent, and the Government were able to pay, I would feel it my duty to vote for the payment of this class of damages when the claimants are loyal citizens.

I beg leave, however, to suggest to the House the utter impracticability of drawing this line of discrimination. I know enough, and I speak for the committee in this particular, to know that it would be an impracticable effort for us to endeavor to determine which were loyal and which disloyal. I will give the House an illustration of the difficulty. A claim, upon which I am prepared to report adversely, amounting to some six or eight thousand dollars, was presented to us by a loyal man with apparently absolute evidence of his loyalty. Upon that claim two favorable reports have been made to the House by the Committee of Claims. I find that it consists of some sixty items of property that were taken during the administration of General Buell at the South. There are sixty items from sixty individuals, and when we came to scrutinize the claims not a particle of evidence was offered to us of the loyalty of any one of the sixty persons interested in the claim. The presenter of it came with clean hands apparently, but he had, perhaps for the purpose of speculation, bought up or made some arrangement by which he was to represent these claims, and upon these claims he has twice obtained a favorable report from a committee of this House.

But that is not all. If we go into an inquiry as to the loyalty of these individuals, my word for it every one of them will give us some evidence of loyalty. You will find that they will be able to procure ex parte affidavits or evidence of some sort apparently sufficient for the establishment of their loyalty. These and like considerations have brought the committee to the conclusion—and that conclusion was unanimous—that an effort to discriminate between the loyal and the disloyal would be an impracticability, and that the result of it would be to bring the House to the payment of all this class of claims; and if that burden is heaped upon the camel's back, I fear that we may have occasion to say that like the last feather it may break it.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] asks me if the resolution excludes all claims that may come up individually on their own merits. The resolution excludes all claims from citizens of disloyal States either for property that has been destroyed by the ravages of war, or for property taken and appropriated for the use of the Army.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. I wish to say that I listened with very great pleasure to the reading of the report made by the gentleman some days ago, and, having once examined this question, I agree with him, as I understand his report, and I feel for one under great obligation to him. I desire to ask him what is the difference, not as a matter of clemency and discretion, but as a matter of law, between a claim presented by a disloyal person and one presented by a loyal man, if both men were citizens of the country occupied and held by the enemy? I ask the question in the light of the decision of the court in the prize cases.

Mr. DELANO. The gentleman asks me a question which it may be very difficult to answer. As a matter of law, I am frank to say to the gentleman that I am not furnished with any authorities that would enable me to draw a distinction.

There may be cases upon this point. But if there are I frankly say to the House that my industry has not brought them under my observation. And if he or any other gentleman knows of any such case I would be obliged to him to inform me. All the time I have been speaking in reference to this distinction between the claims of loyal and disloyal persons I have been speaking in reference to equity and not in reference to law, and I desire the House so to understand me. I have been considering the question in the light of benevolence and equity, rather than in the light of law and strict justice. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] exceedingly pertinent, because it presents to those who see fit to take that view of the subject another reason for rejecting these claims.

I will add further upon this point that it once occurred to me, while I had this report under consideration and preparation, that those who were brought into the rebellion by the sovereign power of their States—for I acknowledge the sovereignty of States to a limited extent—those who were carried into the rebellion by the sovereign action of their States, so far as they could act, thus being in a certain sense enemies, to whom for some purposes belligerent rights were accorded, must necessarily, upon principles of law, stand upon the same platform with those who caused the rebellion.

Mr. SMITH. Appreciating as I do the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] and concurring with him to a great extent in the suggestions he has offered, I wish to ask a question of him which will somewhat rebut the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to make this statement in advance of my question. The citizen owes allegiance to the Government and the Government owes simple protection to the citizen. Now the State of Tennessee has been regarded as a rebellious State. But in that State there have been thirty thousand loyal men who have given their services to the Government of the United States. If, in the progress of the war, the Government has been unable to give full protection to those thirty thousand people in Tennessee, and their property has been destroyed by the march and progress of the armies defending the Government, and if it is the duty of the Government to protect these men in their rights of property, is it not the duty of the Government to refund whatever has been lost in consequence of the movements of the armies? Or are they to be considered as public enemies, because their State has been considered in rebellion?

Mr. DELANO. By no means. I was not putting the question upon the ground that all those who had necessarily suffered were public enemies. But I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] upon what principle of law even the loyal men of Tennessee—and I take the case as strong as he has put it—can say to the General Government that it must pay them for their losses? Upon what principle of law can they say that? They were citizens of a State that had attempted to overthrow the Government, of which it was a constituent member. And as citizens of that State, why should not they be allowed to bear the losses of property as well as of life that were necessarily the result of the acts of the Government in overthrowing the rebellion?

Let us look for a moment at this question. The Government of the United States owed it to itself, its constitutional duty required it, to save and protect the republican governments of those States in rebellion. That was its great constitutional duty, and upon another occasion I may make some remarks upon that subject. The Government went out in arms and in armor to perform its duty. That was a duty above all others that it must perform in order that the nation might be saved. Whatever was necessary to fall in order to enable it to perform that great guarantee must be allowed to fall. Is the Government necessarily bound to make indemnity for individual losses that have resulted from the performance of that great duty of saving the nation? If so, then see where the principle would lead. Would it lead to the payment for the loss of innumerable and invaluable lives sacrificed in the conflict, and with them necessarily all property of far less value and far less consideration? There is no principle of law that would compel the Government to assume the payment of those damages.

However, that is a little off the course of argument upon the subject I was discussing. I was simply discussing, when interrupted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] the equitable consideration of this question of the payment for property taken and appropriated for the subsistence and supply of our armies.

I will not recur to the legal view of the subject which has been suggested by the interruption of the gentleman from New York; but I will take it for granted that there is an equitable duty to make compensation, and will again call the attention of the House to the impossibility—even if equity calls upon us to make payment—of performing that duty under existing circumstances.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my colleague allow me to make an inquiry? It will detain him but a moment.

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. If my understanding of this proposition is correct, the effect of the resolution submitted by the committee is, in the first place, to rule out all claims for damages incidental to the war. That, it seems to me, is eminently proper. But the resolution, as I understand, includes also claims for property appropriated by our Army for its maintenance. Now, there are two classes of cases in regard to which I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the resolution includes them. In the first place, during the war property was taken by the various divisions of our Army for their subsistence, commissary stores, and supplies of all sorts; and to the owners of the property taken receipts were given and vouchers for payment upon proof of loyalty being made to the Federal Government. A large number of such receipts were given all through the South.

There is a second class of cases of which I will give one instance personally known to me. It was at one period of the war determined to fortify the city of Nashville; and it became necessary to tear down several very valuable houses. In one instance, the value of the house was assessed, and regular vouchers were given to the owner, he being a man of known and conspicuous loyalty, in order that he might obtain compensation. In other cases property was thus destroyed, the owners not being present. But suppose that those owners could make undoubted proof of loyalty, and could show that their houses had been torn down by the lawful orders of United States officers for the purpose of building fortifications, would the resolution rule out that class of cases as well as the cases of property taken for the supply of the Army, where vouchers for payment, conditional upon proof of loyalty being made, were given to the owners? I desire to ask the gentleman whether those cases will come within the resolution.

Mr. DELANO. A categorical answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman would be in the affirmative. The resolution would necessarily rule out all claims for damages of every class, as well those resulting from the ravages of war as those resulting from the appropriation of property for the use of the Army, when such claims are made by citizens of States that were in rebellion. It would not apply to claims made by citizens of any other State.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe that feature of the resolution of my colleague would in many cases work injustice. Where citizens of the insurgent States have remained entirely loyal, I do not see on what possible ground of justice we can declare that their claims shall be excluded from consideration, while at the same time we do take into consideration the claims of loyal men of other States. I hope that the resolution will be so amended as not to discriminate against those noble men who were true and loyal in the midst of the general ruin.

Mr. SMITH. If the chairman of the Committee of Claims [Mr. DELANO] will yield to me for one moment, I desire to say, in confirmation of the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that, in my view, it is infinitely better to pay an entirely loyal citizen of any of those States that were considered in rebellion than to pay a citizen of Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, Ohio, or Pennsylvania, whom we believe to be disloyal, but who is, notwithstanding, able to present apparent proofs of loyalty, and thus secure the payment of his claim through the action of Congress or of any of the Departments of this Government.

Mr. DELANO. If my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] will listen till I shall have concluded my statement I think they will not object to the resolution.

I will, in the first place, ask gentlemen of the House to observe that the resolution does not fix a permanent rule of action. It embraces two classes of claims. I have discriminated between them, and need not return to that branch of the subject. It provides that for the present the rule shall be as I have indicated. We of the committee have well understood the difficulty in the class of cases alluded to by my colleague and the gentleman from Kentucky; but for reasons powerful with us we have felt that for the present the rule should be that which we propose to establish by the resolution, "until otherwise ordered," as you will observe.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DELANO. There may be a time when the Government will be willing to take on itself this discrimination between the loyal and disloyal. Wait, I beg you, gentlemen, until you determine whether you have any States or not. You say now your States are dead. I do not know what may follow, and I will not go into that subject, except by way of allusion to it in its bearing on the present question.

Wait until these questions of reconstruction, the return and reestablishment of these States—wait, I say, until these questions shall be decided; but for the present, in view of our national debt and the magnitude of these claims, and above all the great difficulty in discriminating which is loyal and which is disloyal, wait for the present, and let this be your rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me ask the gentleman another question. If I understand him aright in his remarks, the rule, which refers to the destruction of property as an incident of the war, is not to be temporary. I understand by the laws of war, and by our practice in the war of 1812, we have never paid any such claims. The other clause is for a temporary rule. Now, I ask whether we ought not to discriminate?

Mr. DELANO. It seems to me that is a mere verbal criticism; and I make the remark without any discourtesy to the gentleman. I do not think it necessary to introduce two resolutions. Let us adopt the present resolution for the present policy of the Government; and if it is desirable hereafter to modify it in reference to the last class of claims, that can be done.

Now, allow me to say why my mind came to this conclusion. You have upon your statute-book a law which provides for the payment of loyal citizens in the loyal States for all damages resulting from the taking of property for the use of the Army; and you have an easy mode of settling and adjusting these claims, as the Quartermaster General and the Commissary General are authorized to settle and adjust them. Whenever it is the sentiment of this House that the same principle ought to be established in behalf of citizens in the disloyal States, take your statute then and amend it so as to allow citizens from the disloyal States the same privileges of settling their claims before the Quartermaster General and the Commissary General which the citizens of the loyal States have now. You will then adopt a better rule of action than to submit these claims to the uncertain investigation by your committees. For allow me to say to this House, I do think if there is anything in the administration of law by Congress which needs correction, it is the power conferred upon and exercised by the Committee of Claims. They are not able, it is not in the nature of things that they can be able, to investigate these claims in a manner in which they ought to be investigated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel I ought not to detain the House any longer on this question. Before closing, however, I must say that it was necessary, in my judgment, the sense of the House should be taken on this subject, so important to the committee and to the country; and I shall feel it necessary, after allowing some explanation from other members of the committee, to demand the previous question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. DELANO. I yield to my colleague on the Committee of Claims for five minutes.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, as I am a member of the Committee of Claims, I desire to make a brief explanation. I understand the committee have reported the resolution unanimously. Now, while I do not fully agree with the chairman in the line of argument he pursued this morning, I do agree with him in the general proposition contained in the resolution. It is now impracticable to consider these questions, for no committee could take them up and examine them separately as they ought to be, and make such reports to the House as would afford proper basis for action. It is a work which ought to be performed by some board or court outside of Congress when the Government shall have determined to pay these claims, if it shall ever resolve to do so. There ought to be some general law, some civil or military tribunal, for the adjustment of these claims, and we ought not to be called upon to pass a special act in each particular case. That is requiring too much of any committee of this House.

Then we have the question which was raised by the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] The status of the rebel States and their citizens in reference to the General Government has not yet been defined by any action of the House. Upon the view, therefore, that it should first be determined by the House what are the relations of these people to the Government, it is certainly improper for the Committee of Claims to forestall, in their action upon any individual cases, the rule which may be hereafter adopted. If we should attempt to discuss the question a division would come up in the minds of the committee. I have no doubt, especially in view of remarks which the chairman has submitted this morning, that the committee would be unable to agree as to the status of the rebellious States with reference to the Government and all kindred questions. Hence the propriety of deferring all action in relation to claims from these States. For my own part, I confess I have always been under the impression that at some time and in some way we ought at least to reimburse the loyal citizens of the rebellious States who furnished supplies for the Army, and especially that class of claimants who have received vouchers from the Government.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. In the judgment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] is there any class of claims coming from the South more meritorious than those for injury suffered by loyal men on account of their loyalty alone; men whose property was destroyed by rebels, which property would not have been destroyed but for the fact that they stood by the flag of their country? And if the gentleman admits that class of claims as meritorious as any, appealing to sound discretion, I ask whether he proposes in any view that they shall be paid by the Government of the United States?

Mr. NIBLACK. I will try to answer the gentleman. I did not allude in my remarks to that class of claims. I will say, however, in reply, that there is no stronger class than that of persons suffering in that way. But there is a difference according to the law of nations, as I understand it, between this class of claimants and those who have furnished means to our armies; those who have furnished them and have received vouchers for such supplies in the usual form. I regard the latter more favorably than the former, because the faith of the Government has been pledged, I think, in the transaction.

But I was about to remark that I have always believed that in some way and at some time or other we ought to reimburse this class of claimants. But in the present condition of things, in view of the large amount of our debt, and in view of the present financial condition of the country, we are in no condition to meet that question now. And as we are not in a condition to do it, and as other questions of great importance are antecedent to this, and upon which this whole question to some extent hinges, and are yet undetermined, being yet before Congress and before the country, I have consented to support the resolution reported by the committee. I do not concur, however, in the propriety of adopting a resolution permanently suspending action on that class of claims, but prefer to leave this whole question open, to be determined as one of the great questions now pending before the House, upon which we must act, I suppose, during the present Congress.

Therefore, while I am willing to vote for the resolution, and shall do so, I do not wish to be considered as committed to the line of argument submitted by the chairman of the committee, nor to some of the propositions contained in the report which accompanies the resolution of the committee. All I agree to is, that for the present, under existing circumstances, we ought not to attempt to adjudicate on these claims individually; that we cannot do so properly; and hence I hope the House will relieve us from doing so until they shall first adopt some general policy embracing the rebellious States and all the people of those States, which shall give us to understand what are the relations of those people to the Government.

Mr. WARD. I desire, with the permission of the chairman of the committee, to say a few words.

Mr. DELANO. I consent.

Mr. WARD. I concurred with much reluctance in the report which comes from the committee. I felt that the loyal men of the South who have been faithful among the faithless, who had risked all and suffered all, and the wives and children of those who had perished in consequence of their devotion to the national flag, should be in a measure compensated for the losses which they had sustained in consequence of their adherence to the national Government. But, sir, the magnitude of these losses, the difficulty of distinguishing at this time between loyal men and traitors, and the condition of our finances, admonished me that we should not now open a door that would let in financial ruin, national disgrace, and perhaps repudiation of the national debt. I felt that this class of claims might double the national debt, and so bring about results which all would deprecate—results so deplorable, I am sure, that all would wish to avert them, and none more so than those patriotic men whose claims are so strong and who have shown by their sacrifices that the national honor is very dear to them.

And so far as I am concerned I desire to say that I hope this action will not be regarded as final; that it shall not bind as a precedent those who shall come afterward; but I hope that at no distant day, when the dark clouds that surround our national pathway shall have vanished, when the difficult work of reconstruction shall be done, when the nation no longer reels under a gigantic national debt, and when those loyal men shall be clearly ascertained, then justice shall be done to these people, and the nation shall reward them as they deserve.

Mr. THORNTON. I simply desire to make a brief explanation in regard to the report and resolution submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Claims. I concurred in the resolution, but I do not agree with the reasons contained in the report. In regard to one class of claims, those growing out of the ravages of war, I have no hesitation in saying that the Government is under no obligation, at any time, now or hereafter, either in loyal or disloyal States, to pay for the ravages by war, and the resolution would with more propriety, in my judgment, have separated that class from the other. But in regard to that part of the resolution which declares that until otherwise ordered, the Committee of Claims be instructed to reject all claims growing out of the appropriation of or damage to property by the Army and Navy, &c., I cannot agree to it. I understand that the reason which has governed the allowance of claims of this character is based upon the provision in the Constitution that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. Now, I would ask the difference between private property taken in disloyal States and that taken in loyal States. We pay for subsistence taken in loyal States; why not pay for subsistence taken in disloyal States? It seems to me that there can be no difference between property growing out of the mere fact of the residence of its owners. The citizens in the disloyal States owed allegiance to the Federal Government as well as the citizens in loyal States, and we owed them a corresponding protection. Shall it be said that because our armies in marching through the disloyal States took private property for the subsistence and support of the Army, to make it efficient in the suppression of the rebellion, the citizens of those States shall be entirely cut off from relief?

Mr. DELANO. I would inquire of the Chair how much more time I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes more.

Mr. DELANO. Then I must ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow me to resume the floor.

Mr. THORNTON. I will conclude in a moment. The reason why I concur with the resolution is this: I think it is an inopportune time to take up the question of these claims. These States, if they are States—and gentlemen upon the other side declare that they are not—have no Representatives here. I think these claims should be postponed until they have Representatives here. It was for the reason that the committee could not come to any just conclusion in regard to this class of claims that I was in favor of reporting this resolution, and am now in favor of it. I desired merely to explain that I do not concur in the reasons of the report.

Mr. DELANO. Unless the House are disposed to extend the time allotted to me, I shall be under the necessity of bringing the House to a vote on this question, although I would be very glad to accommodate gentlemen.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the previous question will not be called now.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he had better allow this question to be debated for an hour or two.

Mr. DELANO. I have no objection to any extension of time so that I can get a vote on the resolution to-day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that the debate be continued for two hours, ten minutes being allowed to each speaker.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Two hours is too long a time.

Mr. LATHAM. I object to that arrangement, limiting debate to ten-minute speeches.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then let us have a vote now if gentlemen on the other side object to discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would be punishing the whole House for the act of one man.

Mr. DELANO. I have no objection to any extension of time the House may desire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that at three minutes after two o'clock the special order will come up, which is the consideration of the bill in relation to the Freedmen's Bureau, which is the special order for to-day after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. DELANO. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope that it will be sustained, since objection is made on the other side to discussion.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were, on a division—ayes 73, noes 37.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. LE BLOND. I think there has been a misunderstanding upon this subject. I do not think my friend upon my right [Mr. LATHAM] meant to object to any time being taken for debate.

Mr. LATHAM. My objection was misunderstood. I objected merely to the taking of two hours' time for debate.

The SPEAKER. Notwithstanding the seconding of the previous question, debate can go on by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is too late now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio suggested that ten-minute speeches for two hours be allowed upon this proposition to-day, and at the end of the two hours the House should come to a vote upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to two hours' debate, though I would agree to one hour.

Mr. JOHNSON. Would that include the hour to which the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] as the member who reported this resolution, is entitled after the previous question is seconded?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The Chair will ask if there is any objection to continuing the debate for one hour.

Mr. DEMING. I object to that.

Mr. LATHAM. Is it in order to refer this resolution to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I object to anything but voting.

The main question was then ordered, which was upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. As there seems to be a determination to cut off any suggestions that may come from others, I shall have to move to lay this resolution upon the table, and upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 36, nays 118, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyer, Brooks, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Harris, Chester D. Hubbard, Johnson, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Nicholson, Phelps, Radford, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Shanklin, Smith, Stevens, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, and Wright—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bouwell, Brandegee, Broonall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, De-frees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Lafin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercier, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Upton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu D. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Walker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—118.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Bergen, Bromwell, Chanler, Culver, Driggs, Dumont, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Hulburd, Jones, Kerr, McCullough, Morris, Newell, Noell, Pike, Pomeroy, Raymond, Sitgreaves, Stillwell, Strouse, Trowbridge, Voorhees, Whaley, and Stephen F. Wilson—28.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was sustained. I hope gentlemen will give us on this side of the House thirty minutes. That is all we ask to debate this subject.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. Upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the resolution, which was again read, as follows:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, the Committee of Claims be instructed to reject all claims referred to them for examination by citizens of any of the States lately in rebellion, growing out of the destruction or appropriation of or damage to property by the Army or Navy while engaged in suppressing the rebellion.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DELANO. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the resolution; and I also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

SHIP-CANAL IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to construct a ship-canal for the passage of armed and naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire that rule 134, in reference to excluding from the floor of the House those not specially entitled to be here, shall be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands that rule 134, in reference to admission to the floor, be enforced. The doorkeepers are required to enforce the rule, upon the demand of any member. Gentlemen not privileged to remain on the floor under that rule will retire.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is not the Doorkeeper required to enforce the rule without a demand by any member?

The SPEAKER. He is; but yesterday Major General Sherman was introduced—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to have that rule either repealed or enforced. I often have friends whom I would like to introduce here if others introduce their friends.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state that Major General Sherman was introduced here yesterday contrary to the rules; but the Chair supposes that the Doorkeeper would not be held responsible for that. The rule will be enforced whenever any member insists upon it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire whether General Sherman has not received by name a vote of thanks from Congress.

The SPEAKER. That would not entitle him to admission under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's Private Secretary, Foreign Ministers, the Governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, and Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives."

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire whether it would not be in order to move that that rule be referred to the Committee on Rules for the purpose of extending the privilege of the floor. There are persons who are not included in the list of privileged persons, but who now should certainly be admitted; for instance, ex-members. There was a period when ex-members became, in some cases, claim-agents and, therefore, they were excluded by our rule. But I see no such persons here now; and it seems to me that it would not interfere with legislation at all, if the privilege of the floor were extended so as to include some persons not now privileged by the rule.

The SPEAKER. The rules have all been referred to the Committee on Rules by a resolution adopted on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] on the first day of the session; but the committee generally do not report on any special subject unless it be specially referred to them.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order at the present time to move to refer this subject to the committee?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] is entitled to the floor on the special order.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have no desire to interfere with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to inquire, Mr. Speaker, so that no mistakes may be made by members, whether this rule will be so interpreted as to admit to the floor of the House the various Governors of the southern States—Governors by virtue of election as such.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to inquire whether any of those Governors have applied to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] to procure their admission.

Mr. VOORHEES. My personal relations and intercourse with gentlemen are not public property.

Mr. CONKLING. If I had supposed that there was any secret about the matter I would not have asked the question.

Mr. VOORHEES. Whether they have or not, possibly some one of them may apply either to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Conkling] or myself; and if this is an open question, I would suggest that this rule be referred to the joint committee of fifteen, to determine whether the Governors of the Southern States can come on this floor under the rule of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, my remarks were made entirely in good faith—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will please suspend his remarks till the Chair responds to the point made by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Chair cannot anticipate any decision that may be made hereafter. Whenever that point shall be properly raised for the decision of the Speaker he will decide it as he decides all other questions, subject to an appeal to the House. No such question has yet been submitted for the decision of the Chair.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RAN-

DALL] asks unanimous consent to make a motion for reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—AGAIN.

Mr. ELIOT. I now call for the special order.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask my colleague to yield to me for one moment, to take from the Speaker's table a bill in reference to new post routes, which will take only a little while to pass on it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object. The other side objected to my motion.

Mr. ELIOT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must call up the regular order of business, which is the special order in reference to the Freedmen's Bureau.

I am directed to report back from the committee on freedmen Senate bill No. 60, to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, with certain amendments in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read the substitute.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed Senate joint resolution No. 26, for the payment of the expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called "confederate States of America;" in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—AGAIN.

Mr. WRIGHT. As the Clerk read the bill, it does not agree with the copy which has been printed and put upon our desks.

Mr. ELIOT. The Clerk read the substitute and not the original bill. There are two sections six, and if gentlemen will strike their pens through the first one it will be right.

Mr. TAYLOR. Are there not other changes from the bill before us? I think there are a great many differences.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope the bill will be ordered to be printed as modified, and postponed to a future day.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, before commencing the debate on this bill, I will state wherein the substitute reported from the committee differs from the printed bill. It differs in two respects; and if gentlemen will turn to the bill I can explain so that it can be understood.

Turn to section second. We insert the words "and when the same shall be necessary for the operations of the bureau;" so that it will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, and when the same shall be necessary for the operations of the bureau, may divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in such district, and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent, either a citizen, officer of the Army, or enlisted man, who, if an officer, shall serve without additional compensation or allowance, and if a citizen or enlisted man, shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,500 per annum, &c.

Next, after the word "salary," insert "of not less than $500 nor more than $1,200, according to the services rendered, in full compensation for said services," striking out of course the words "not exceeding $1,500 per annum." That is a limitation of the salaries as well as a reduction.

The next is to strike out these words:

Each assistant commissioner may employ not exceeding six clerks, one of the third class and five of the first class, and each agent of a sub-district may employ two clerks of the first class.

And to insert the following:

And the Commissioner may, when the same shall be necessary, assign to each assistant commissioner not exceeding three clerks; and to each of said agents one clerk, at an annual salary not exceeding $1,000 each, provided suitable clerks cannot be detailed from the Army.

That reduces the expenses.

The next amendment is in the fifth section, which reads as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

The committee propose to add the following proviso:

Provided, Whenever the owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field orders shall be entitled to the restoration of said lands, the Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon the agreement and with the written consent of said occupants, to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, or to set apart for them out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this bill forty acres each, upon the terms and conditions named in said section.

The next amendment is in section six. It reads as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide or cause to be erected suitable buildings for asylums and schools. But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expense incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for the general purposes of this act, out of which payments for said lands shall be made. And the Commissioner shall cause such lands from time to time to be valued, allotted, assigned, and sold in manner and form provided in the fourth section of this act at a price not less than the cost thereof to the United States.

We strike out the words "for the general" and insert "such," so that it will read "such purposes;" and instead of "of this act out of which payments for said lands shall be made," insert these words:

And no payments shall be made for lands purchased under this section, except for asylums and schools, from any moneys not specifically appropriated therefor.

In the eighth section we insert the words "and the preceding;" so that it will read:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who, under color of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation or custom, shall, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, subject, or cause to be subjected, any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person, on account of race or color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or for any other cause, to the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons, or to any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts or offenses, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both; and it shall be the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of and hear and determine all offenses committed against the provisions of this section, and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the preceding section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States, through the War Department, shall prescribe. The jurisdiction conferred by this and the preceding section on the officers and agents of this bureau shall cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to understand from the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this bill now before us is printed with the amendments as it passed the Senate.

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir; as it passed.

Mr. CONKLING. So that the amendments proposed are ingrafted on the bill as it passed.

Mr. ELIOT. There is one formal amendment in the eighth section, a mere verbal one. In line twenty-five strike out the word "to" and insert "shall," so that it shall read, "The jurisdiction conferred by this and the preceding sections shall cease." The grammar of it troubled some of my literary friends, and it may now as well be made right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will proceed to open the debate upon this subject, and I should be glad to have the discussion of it brought to as speedy a close as practicable. It is of importance that we should legislate upon this matter quickly, and I hope it will not be necessary to occupy, either on this or the other side of the House, much time in its discussion.

Before proceeding, however, I will move to recommit the bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. ELIOT. I will for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PIKE.) The motion to recommit cuts off amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. I withdraw the motion to recommit for that purpose.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move to insert in section six, line seven, after the word "schools," the following:

And the Commissioner may provide a common-school education for all refugees or freedmen who shall apply therefor.

Mr. ELIOT. I now renew the motion to recommit.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to ask the gentleman in regard to the proposed arrangement for debate on this subject. Do I understand him to say that he invited or did not invite debate?

Mr. ELIOT. I did not say either. I said I was desirous to have the debate upon it come to an end as soon as practicable. I do not propose to interfere with a reasonable discussion, if that is what the gentleman means.

Mr. CHANLER. That is all I wish. Does the gentleman propose to permit reasonable discussion of the bill, and if so, will he state what he means by reasonable discussion?

Mr. ELIOT. I shall have to reserve the answer to that, for I promise the gentleman now that if the debate upon the bill assumes a wide range and embraces all subjects of reconstruction, I shall feel myself called upon to demand the previous question. But so long as a reasonable discussion of the bill is wanted I do not expect to do so.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he will yield to me to make some remarks on the amendment I have offered and upon the bill generally.

Mr. ELIOT. Why, no sir, I cannot exactly do that; but the gentleman shall have an opportunity to present his views upon his amendment.

Mr. Speaker, on the 3d day of last March the bill establishing a Freedmen's Bureau became a law. It was novel legislation, without precedent in the history of any nation, rendered necessary by the rebellion of eleven slave States and the consequent liberation from slavery of four million persons whose unpaid labor had enriched the lands and impoverished the hearts of their relentless masters. No thoughtful man could have observed the early successes of our Union armies without discerning the great work which final triumph would render needful. The rebellion miserably failed; but its failure has effected a revolution greater than its success could have achieved—a revolution in the industrial and social systems of all the southern States. So it is that good is educed from evil. That is a revolution that cannot go backward, nor can its far-extending influence be bounded by the States where it began. The South was poisoned by slavery, but South and North will be braced to fresher health and inspired to higher life by freedom. Already we feel its life-giving impulses. The slave becomes freedman, and the freedman man, and the man citizen, and the citizen must be endowed with all the rights which other men possess.

Say not, my friends, this must not be, for truly it must be! Resist it not! Fight not against it, lest you too hear the voice as of old, "Saul! Saul! why persecutest thou me?" It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.

"The great objects of humanity are best attained when conformed to His laws in the formation of Governments as well as in all things else." That is what the rebel vice president Stephens said. "Our confederacy," he continued, "is founded upon principles in strict conformity with those laws. This stone which was first rejected by the builders is become the 'chief stone of the corner' in our new edifice." That blasphemy has been punished. But do you not see that in a sense far other than that which he intended, that rejected stone is yet to be and forever to remain the foundation stone? But it will be the rock of freedom and not of slavery on which our Republic will rest.

At an early day, when the fortunes of war had shown alternate triumphs and defeats to loyal arms, and the timid feared and the disloyal hoped, it was my grateful office to introduce the first bill creating a bureau of emancipation. It was during the Thirty-Seventh Congress. But although the select committee to which the bill was referred was induced to agree that it should be reported to the House, it so happened that the distinguished chairman, Judge White, of Indiana, did not succeed in reporting it for our action. At the beginning of the Thirty-Eighth Congress it was again presented, and very soon was reported back to the House under the title of "A bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs." It was fully debated and passed by the House. The vote was sixty-nine in favor and sixty-seven against the bill; but of the sixty-seven who opposed it fifty-six had been counted against it, because of their political affinities. On the 1st of March, 1864, the bill went to the Senate. It came back to the House on the 30th of June, four days before the adjournment of Congress. To my great regret the Senate had passed an amendment in the nature of a substitute attaching this bureau to the Treasury Department. But it was too late to take action upon it then, and the bill was postponed until December. At that time the House non-concurred with the Senate, and a committee of conference was chosen. The managers of the two Houses could not agree as to whether the War Department or the Treasury should manage the affairs of the bureau. They therefore agreed upon a bill creating an independent department neither attached to the War nor Treasury, but communicating directly with the President, and resting for its support upon the arm of the War Department. That bill was also passed by the House but was defeated in the Senate. Another conference committee was chosen, and that committee, whose chairman in the House was the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, then and now at the head of the Military Committee, agreed upon a bill attaching the bureau to the War Department and embracing refugees as well as freedmen in its terms. That bill is now the law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the attention of the House to what has been done in organizing and conducting the affairs of this bureau since the passage of the act. And I will do it as briefly as I can from the official records which have been procured at the Department.

The law was approved on the 3d of March, 1865. Nine months have not yet elapsed since its organization. The order from the War Department under which the bureau was organized bears date on the 12th of May, 1865. General Howard, who was then in command of the department of Tennessee, was assigned as Commissioner of the bureau. The bill became a law so late in the session that it was impossible for Congress to legislate any appropriation for its support. It was necessary, therefore, that the management of it should be placed in the hands of military officers, and fortunately the provisions of the bill permitted that to be done. General Howard was, as I stated, in command of the department of Tennessee when he was detailed to this duty. But on the 15th of May, that is to say, within three days after the order appointing him was issued, he assumed the duties of his office; and when he did so, I take occasion to state that while he intended as the Commissioner of the bureau to provide as much uniformity as he could in the matter of the employment and of the education of the freedmen, he solicited the cooperation of all officers then in the field, under appointment from the Treasury or from any other quarter, to aid him in his work. And I believe it has been his policy throughout, that while the freedman should understand that he was truly free, he should not, if he was able to work, entertain the thought that the Government, by reason of the existence of this bureau, was disposed or intended to support him in idleness.

In the course of a few days the Commissioner of the bureau announced more particularly the policy which he designed to pursue. The whole supervision of the care of freedmen and of all lands which the law placed under the charge of the bureau was to be intrusted to assistant commissioners. It was stated, as has been found to be correct, that the demand for labor would be sufficient to afford occupation to nearly all those classed as freedmen who were able to work.

The assistant commissioners were enjoined to effect as rapidly as they could complete organization for labor, and to provide that that labor should be fairly compensated. It was not found practicable to determine the rates of wages, but the officers of the bureau were instructed carefully to inquire, and having ascertained what amount of compensation had ordinarily, at the places where inquiry was made, been previously paid to masters who had hired out labor, they would be able from that to form a pretty correct opinion as to the true value of it, and that the wages fixed upon for freedmen should be determined somewhat by the result of such inquiry.

Before a month had expired, headquarters had been established for assistant commissioners at Richmond, Raleigh, Beaufort, Montgomery, Nashville, St. Louis, Vicksburg, New Orleans, and Jacksonville, and very shortly afterward assistant commissioners were designated for those posts of duty. They were required to possess themselves as soon as practicable with the duties incident to their offices, to quicken in every way they could and to direct the industry of the freedmen. Notice was given that the relief establishments which had been created by law under the operations of the War Department should be discontinued as soon as they could be consistently with the comfort and proper protection of the freedmen, and that every effort should be made—and I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that that policy has been pursued throughout—that every effort should be made to render the freedmen at an early day self-supporting. The supplies that had been furnished by the Government were only to be continued so long as the actual wants of the freedmen seemed to require it. At that time there were all over the country refugees who were seeking their homes, and they were notified that, under the care of the bureau, they would be protected from abuse and directed in their efforts to secure transportation and proper facilities for reaching home.

Wherever there had been interruption of civil law, it was found impossible that the rights of freedmen could be asserted in the courts, and where there were no courts before which their rights could be brought for adjudication, military tribunals, provost-marshal's courts, were established for the purpose of determining upon questions arising between freedmen or between freedmen and other parties; and that also has been continued to this day.

The commissioners were instructed to permit the freedmen to select their own employers and to choose their own kind of service. All agreements were ordered to be free and mutual, and not to be compulsory. The old system that had prevailed of overseer labor was ordered to be repudiated by the commissioners who had charge of the laborers, and I believe there has been no time since the organization of the bureau when there have not been reports made to headquarters at Washington of all labor contracts; and wherever any provisions had been inserted, by inadvertence or otherwise, that seemed unjustly to operate against the freedmen, they have been stricken out by direction of the Commissioner here. Perhaps I may say that the other day a resolution of inquiry was directed to the select committee whether certain contracts had been permitted that were offensive to our sense of right and oppressive to the freedmen, and the committee, in the course of their investigation, ascertained that in no instance had any such contract, if made, received the assent of the Commissioner here, but that, without exception, all contracts which had been reported here at Washington had been so altered as that they were free from any oppressive provisions and left to the freedman all the rights which as a citizen he ought to have in contracting for his work.

In the course of the next month action was taken by the Commissioner respecting a provision of the law as it was passed in March, authorizing the Secretary of War to make issues of clothing and provisions, and the assistant commissioners were required carefully to ascertain whatever might be needed under that provision of the law, and to make periodical reports as to the demands made upon the Government through the Bureau. Directions were given by the Commissioner to his assistant commissioners to make repeated reports to him upon all the various subjects which had come under his charge—with regard to the number of freedmen, where they were, whether in camps or in colonies, or whether they were employed upon Government works, and stating, if they obtained supplies, how they were furnished, whether by donations or whether procured by purchase. Reports were also required as to all lands which had been put under the care of the bureau; and statements were called for showing descriptions of the lands, whether, in the language of the law, "abandoned" or "confiscated," so that the bureau here could have full and complete information of all action of its agents throughout these States, and upon examination it could be determined where any specific lands which were under the charge of the bureau came from, and how they were derived.

In the course of the summer it became necessary to issue additional instructions. The Commissioner found that his way was beset with difficulties, he was walking upon unknown ground, he was testing here and there questions involved in doubt. It was hardly possible at once and by one order to designate all that it would be needful for him to do, and therefore different instructions were issued from time to time from his office. The assistant commissioners were called upon thoroughly to examine, either by themselves or their agents, the respective districts allotted to them, to make inquiry as to the character of the freedmen under their charge, their ability to labor, their disposition to labor, and the circumstances under which they were placed, so that the aid, the care, and the protection which the law contemplated might be afforded to them as quickly and as economically as possible.

The Commissioner continually repeated his injunctions to his assistants to be sure that no compulsory or unpaid labor was tolerated, and that both the moral and intellectual condition of the freedmen should be improved as systematically and as quickly as practicable.

It was manifestly impossible for this bureau to undertake this work and to carry it on successfully alone, and so the Commissioner called upon the various benevolent associations organized throughout the North and the West to render that aid in the future which they had rendered in the past, and to cooperate with him in the work which he had in hand. And especially in the matter of schools it was found important for the bureau to avail itself of the experience gained before its organization by the benevolent associations of different parts of the North and the West. Other instructions were also given connected with the medical department of the bureau; and if gentlemen will take the trouble to look into the report which has been furnished by the bureau, they will find that it required no little care and thought to organize and carry out the medical department of the Freedmen's Bureau.

All the affairs of the bureau have been conducted by four general departments—of finance, of lands, of records, and of medicine. To each of these departments competent officers were assigned. And from the report made by General Howard, and which has been laid upon the tables of members, every gentleman will be able to ascertain what has been done and how it has been done.

When the bureau was first organized, indeed when it was first urged upon the attention of this House, it was stated and it was believed that the bureau would very shortly be self-sustaining. And yet in his report General Howard calls for large appropriations, and undoubtedly at the proper time we shall hear a response to that call from the Committee on Appropriations. Now, it is right enough that gentlemen who are called upon to legislate here should understand the facts in this case. One fact is perfectly obvious: that the bureau, if it is to be self-sustaining, must be supported by labor. That was the idea from the beginning. And when it was stated here in debate that the bureau would probably be self-sustaining, it was supposed that from the lands abandoned, confiscated, sold, and the lands of the United States, which by the provisions of the bill had been placed under the care of the Commissioner, these freedmen would be given an opportunity to earn substantially enough for the conduct of the bureau. And I have no doubt at all that such would have been the case had the original expectation been carried out.

There were large tracts of land in Virginia and the other rebel States which were clearly applicable to this purpose. There was the source of supply—the lands and the labor. There were laborers enough, and there was rich land enough. Now, how does it happen that so large a call has been made upon Congress? It must be observed that up to this time Congress has not appropriated one dollar from the Treasury of the United States for the support of this bureau. There have been large uses made of Government stores, clothing, medicine, and food, but no direct appropriation of money by law has been made.

At a very early day the abandoned lands were turned over to the care of the commissioners, and I supposed, and probably we all supposed, that the lands, which in the language of the law were known as "abandoned lands," and those which were in the possession of the United States, would be appropriated to the uses of these freedmen. Within a week after the Commissioner assumed the duties of his office he found it necessary to issue an order substantially like this: whereas large amounts of lands in the State of Virginia and in other States have been abandoned, and are now in the possession of freedmen, and are now under cultivation by them, and whereas the owners of those lands are now calling for their restoration, so as to deprive the freedmen of the results of their industry, it is ordered that the abandoned lands now under cultivation be retained by the freedmen until the growing crops can be secured, unless full and just compensation can be made them for their labor and its products.

This is the part about which it appeared that some difference of judgment existed between the Executive and the Commissioner of the bureau:

"The above order will not be construed so as to relieve disloyal persons from the consequences of their disloyalty; and the application for the restoration of their lands by this class of persons will in no case be entertained by any military authority."

It was found, not a great while afterward, that the views which the President entertained as to his duty were somewhat in conflict with the provisions of this order; for it was held by the President that persons who had brought themselves within the range of his pardon and had secured it, and who had taken or did afterward take the amnesty oath, would be entitled, as one of the results of the pardon and of their position after the oath had been taken, to a restoration of their lands which had been assigned to freedmen. In consequence of this, an order was subsequently issued—

Mr. STEVENS. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear it with pleasure.

Mr. STEVENS. I have never seen any of those pardons; and I desire to ask the gentleman whether he has ever seen one, and whether those pardons were extended to the recipients as rebels or traitors, and also as belligerents, or only as rebels. I ask the question because all this property was seized, under the express terms of the law, as property of enemies, not of rebels, without any condemnation; and I want to know how a pardon could affect property seized in that way.

Mr. ELIOT. I have not had an opportunity to see any of those pardons. I should be very glad to give the gentleman the information he seeks, if I could.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman's remarks; but I would like to ask him a question in reference to the eighth section of this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I shall be glad to answer the gentleman if I can.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Are we to understand this section as meaning that one of the agents of this bureau is to have jurisdiction and authority to hear and determine a case where the penalty by this section is imprisonment not exceeding one year, and a fine not exceeding $1,000?

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Well, will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment to this section?

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I would like to have my amendment read.

Mr. ELIOT. I will say to the gentleman that a motion to amend could not be made under the rules, while the present motion is pending.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Well, sir, I will read my amendment, and then I think the gentleman will accept it. It is to add to the eighth section this proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the trial, by jury, of any white person, as contemplated by article three, section two, of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ELIOT. I believe the language of the gentleman's amendment is "any white person."

Mr. TRIMBLE. Yes, sir. If it will suit the gentleman any better, I will say "any person."

Mr. ELIOT. If the gentleman will read the bill carefully, he will see that when the opportunity for trial by jury shall come, the section to which he refers will probably be inoperative. That section is to continue in force only while the courts are not in operation, and until these States are restored to their former relations in the Union.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ELIOT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LE BLOND. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether this bill does not extend to States that have not been in rebellion, as well as to those that have been.

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir; it certainly does.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then is it not justly liable to the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TRIMBLE?]

Mr. ELIOT. This bill extends to all the States; it is not sectional legislation.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Will the gentleman permit me to offer this amendment, to apply only to the State of Kentucky, that has never been out of the Union, whose relations to the Union have never been disturbed?

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think the gentleman from Kentucky would seriously desire to insert in a bill to be passed here a provision that it shall not override the Constitution. The Constitution will take care of itself, and we cannot interfere with it. There is nothing in this bill that attempts to do so.

I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that, because of the action which the bureau had taken, and the belief on the part of the President that the parties securing pardons should have a right to the restoration of their lands, another order, which is pretty well known as circular No. 15, was issued.

And under the operation of that circular, on its appearing satisfactorily to any assistant commissioner that any property under his control is not "abandoned," as defined in the law, and that the United States have acquired no perfect right to it, it is to be restored and the fact reported to the Commissioner. "Abandoned" lands were to be restored to the owners pardoned by the President, by the assistant commissioners, to whom applications for such restoration were to be forwarded; and each application was to be accompanied by the pardon of the President and by a copy of the oath of amnesty prescribed in the President's proclamation, and also by a proof of title to the land. It must be obvious that the effect of this must have been to transfer from the care of the bureau to the owners very large portions of the land which had been relied upon for the support of the freedmen. Within a few weeks from the date of that order, no less than $800,000 worth of property in New Orleans was transferred, and about one third of the whole property in North Carolina in possession of the bureau was given up; and the officer having charge of the land department reports that before the end of the year, in all probability, there will be under the charge of the Commissioner little, if any, of the lands originally designed for the support of these freedmen.

It is obvious, if these lands are to be taken, that other lands must be provided, or the freedmen will become a dead weight upon the Treasury, and the bill under consideration assigns other lands, in the place of those thus taken, from the unoccupied public lands of the United States.

Two months before the Commission took the control of the bureau, in January, 1865, Major General Sherman, then at Savannah, issued the celebrated Field Order No. 15. You will find that order in the printed report of General Howard. It is very well known that by that order the islands from Charleston, south, the abandoned rice-fields along the river for thirty miles back from the sea, and the country bordering the St. John's river, Florida, were reserved and set apart for the settlement of the negroes made free by the acts of war and the proclamation of the President of the United States.

I had occasion to see that order in January last in manuscript, and when the privileges it conferred were known to the freedmen they gladly availed themselves of the benefits it secured to them. Settlements increased and industry was fostered; and during the war regiments were formed to fight our battles from the men who were living on these Edisto islands.

The order of General Sherman provides as follows:

"II. At Beaufort, Hilton Head, Savannah, Fernandina, St. Augustine, and Jacksonville, the blacks may remain in their chosen or accustomed vocations, but on the islands, and in the settlements hereafter to be established, no white person whatever, unless military officers and soldiers detailed for duty, will be permitted to reside; and the sole and exclusive management of affairs will be left to the freed people themselves, subject only to the United States military authority and the acts of Congress. By the laws of war and orders of the President of the United States the negro is free, and must be dealt with as such. He cannot be subjected to conscription or forced military service, save by the written orders of the highest military authority of the department, under such regulations as the President or Congress may prescribe. Domestic servants, blacksmiths, carpenters, and other mechanics, will be free to select their own work and residence, but the young and able-bodied negroes must be encouraged to enlist as soldiers in the service of the United States, to contribute their share toward maintaining their own freedom, and securing their rights as citizens of the United States.

"Negroes so enlisted will be organized into companies, battalions, and regiments, under the orders of the United States military authorities, and will be paid, fed, and clothed according to law. The bounties paid on enlistment may, with the consent of the recruit, go to assist his family settlement in procuring agricultural implements, seed, tools, hoots, clothing, and other articles necessary for their livelihood."

Now, sir, this House will be called upon to say what shall be done in behalf of the freedmen who were thus invited by General Sherman to fight our battles, and thus assigned by him lands on these islands. These assignments or allotments, made by him as a military commander, conferred merely possessory titles. There have been efforts made to remove these freedmen from these lands; and last October it became necessary for the Commissioner of the bureau to go to South Carolina for the purpose of seeing what arrangements, if any, he could make.

It had been said that the freedmen were to be removed. Great feeling, great sorrow, and great indignation had been expressed; and great fears had been entertained lest the word of promise to the ear should be broken to the hope. General Howard, on his reaching there, called a meeting of the freedmen and soon ascertained one fact; and that was, that they were unwilling to work for their former masters. I believe there was no exception. He found they were fearful of removal; and he stated to them what he believed were the wishes of the President, and what was his own duty to the community under his charge.

It resulted in this: an agreement was made, a form of obligation entered into for the owner to sign, and a form of transfer was made giving up the land, and it was supposed by General Howard that under this circular No. 15, the lands would soon be taken from the freedmen.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I hope not. I trust my colleague will be permitted to go on.

Mr. DONNELLY. I have no objection to his going on and concluding his remarks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts intend to take a vote to-night?

Mr. ELIOT. There are some members who, I understand, wish to speak; I shall not, therefore, expect a vote to-day.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will be allowed to go on.

Mr. RADFORD. Is it understood that there is to be no vote taken to-day?

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PIKE.) The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Massachusetts will therefore proceed.

Mr. ELIOT. I was just saying that it resulted in preparing a form of obligation for the land owner, and of restoration, to be signed by the Commissioner himself, under the provisions of circular No. 15. Before General Howard left the South, however, he received a telegraphic communication from the Secretary of War, saying that the orders under which he acted did not require him to disturb the freedmen in their possession at that time, but to ascertain merely whether a just and mutual agreement could be effected between the freedmen and those who desired to employ them. That was last October. From that time there has been, as I believe, no action taken in regard to these Edisto lands, and they are held now waiting the action of Congress.

Mr. THAYER. I wish to make an inquiry in regard to the proviso that the gentleman has been speaking about. In the fifth section—which I observe is not printed in the bill before us—there seems to be a little ambiguity in the phraseology. I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts to inform the House in regard to the construction he puts upon it himself.

Mr. ELIOT. The bill, as it comes from the Senate, in section five provides that the occupants of land are confirmed for three years, and the proviso is, that whenever the owners of the lands occupied under that order shall be entitled to restoration the Commissioner is authorized, upon an agreement and with the consent of the occupants, to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, or to provide lands under the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. THAYER. The point to which I wish to direct the gentleman's attention is, whether the language used is intended to convey the idea that where the owner is entitled to restoration the consent of the occupant is a necessary condition precedent to the restoration. I do not understand why, otherwise, the words "with the consent and agreement of the occupants" are used when the power is given to the Commissioner to appropriate other lands in lieu of those to which the former owner was entitled.

Mr. ELIOT. The allotments were made and continue until some other military action, or until the action of Congress. The Senate by the bill, as it has come to the House, confirms the titles for a term of years. The amendment proposed by the committee provides that if the owners of the lands, either under the circular No. 15—which is believed to be inoperative or illegal by many persons—or in any other way, should be entitled to their lands, the freedmen who have had those lands allotted to them should not be expelled from them against their consent and without a provision for another home.

Mr. THAYER. I understand by the proviso that the consent of the occupant is necessary before restoration takes place.

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir; that they should not be compelled to expatriate themselves or be driven into Florida or Georgia, or anywhere else, away from their own homes; that they should not be compelled to leave the lands which the Government had assigned them, but that their consent should be obtained to take another home.

Mr. THAYER. That the consent of the occupant is necessary before the Commissioner can order a restoration?

Mr. ELIOT. Before a restoration should be ordered; before the former owner should be put in occupancy again of his estate.

Mr. THAYER. There seems to be a little solecism in the language of the proviso in speaking in the same breath of a person being entitled to restoration, and at the same time making the restoration depend upon the rights of a third party.

Mr. ELIOT. I dare say the criticism may be good; but it is verbal, and I do not think it strikes at the meaning.

Mr. THAYER. It is verbal, but it also has some substance in it, because the proviso may mean either one of two things. Grammatically it would mean, I take it, that where the owner was entitled to restoration he should have restoration, and that the occupants should leave their lands if he wanted them. But I supposed that as there seemed to be no particular reason why the consent of the man who is offered the lands should be made a condition for giving them to him, probably the very meaning which the gentleman now tells me was intended to be attached to the proviso was the meaning intended to be conveyed. I understand that the gentleman distinctly asserts that that was the meaning intended to be imparted by the proviso.

Mr. ELIOT. It was not intended that the freedmen should be compelled to vacate the lands upon which they had been placed by the Government until another home satisfactory to them was procured for them.

Mr. THAYER. I would suggest, then, whether it would not, perhaps, be well to substitute for the words "where parties are entitled to a restoration," the words "where parties make application for restoration," or some similar words.

Mr. ELIOT. Well, it is very possible that may be so.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know something about these lands which are referred to as lands to which parties are "entitled to restoration." I want to know whether there is any doubt about these lands having been the lands of men engaged in the belligerent enemy's army, and subject to confiscation under our law of 1862? Did not the lands belong, before they were taken by us, to belligerent foes, and were they not seized by us as an enemy's property and thus appropriated? I ask the question, because, if that be so, I want to know why the gentleman talks about their being "entitled to restoration."

Mr. ELIOT. Well, even suppose it were as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests, the time might come when they would be entitled to restoration. The suggestion made by the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] is one that I shall probably be very glad to avail myself of hereafter.

Mr. THAYER. I make the suggestion because I think the language of the bill would, in all probability, give rise to difficulty.

Mr. ELIOT. The difficulty might very easily be removed by saying that "whenever the owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field order shall make application to be restored to said lands," &c. Before a final vote is taken on the bill that difficulty can be obviated.

Mr. Speaker, there are so many reasons that ought to be given to the House why this bureau should be enlarged and continued that I am at a loss to know which to specify first; but I want to read right here an argument which comes from the freedmen of Virginia in a letter to the Speaker of this House. It is a letter which the Speaker was kind enough to place in my hands early in the session, and is dated "Tappanock, December 8, 1865." I will read it exactly as it is written:

"HONOR'D SIR: I desire to write you a few lines concerning we colored people, who by our emancipation are now left homeless, moneyless, and friendless, and in many cases we are worse now than when in a state of slavery. Our employers refuse to pay us wages for our work; they also refuse to rent us lands or sell us lands. By this we are in a wretched state. Please, Mr. Speaker, to lay this before the members, that they may add a few drops of water to the great flame that is now sweeping over the great mansion of we colored people. We need homes and protection, pay for our work and also work to do. We also want Schools for the education of our children. We need Churches to worship the true and living God in. We need protection for our person and property. Please, Mr. Speaker, add one word concerning our wages the present year. We have no power of our own. We can do nothing more than Petition; and if we are Dejected, then for weeping and wailing and such troubles as yet never been known in Earth. Please Mr. Speaker add a few words in behalf of we Colored People, who have over proved ourselves to be loyal to your Government. By so doing you will oblige, Mr. Speaker, Your many kind Friends."

I think that is a pretty good argument for the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly, sir.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to ask the gentleman, not because I am opposed to the bill, but for an argument on this point, what he understands or means in this bill by the term "refugees" in contradistinction to the term "freedmen?" His answer will probably lead me to ask another question.

Mr. ELIOT. I suppose refugees to be those who are not freedmen; that is to say those who had not been in slavery. Colored refugees may be freedmen or they may not; but refugees may be white; and when the terms "refugees" and "freedmen" are used, I suppose the difference would be that the refugees were white.

Mr. SMITH. Then the word "refugee" applies only to whites. I would inquire further if, under this law and under the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau, all white men who were not rebels and who were as poor as the negroes are entitled to the same privileges and the same protection that negroes are?

Mr. ELIOT. The object of this bill is to place the refugees—that is to say the loyal white men who have fled from their homes because of the rebellion—upon the same footing with the freedmen as to the care and protection of the Government.

Mr. SMITH. I would ask the gentleman another question. I would inquire if he has received any letters, or if it is within the knowledge of the committee, that there are any people in Virginia or any other of the southern States, of the white race, who are in the same condition in regard to property and the right to hold property that negroes are, and if there is as much disposition on the part of the committee to take care of them as there is to take care of the negroes? Because in the South there are a large number of white people who never have owned a foot of land, who never have been in possession of any property, not even a cow or a horse, yet who have been as true and devoted loyalists as anybody else. I would like to know if the provisions of this bill are intended to embrace them and protect them, and if the idea suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that all the property South must be confiscated for the benefit of those who live in States that have been considered loyal will inure to their benefit as well as to the benefit of the people of Pennsylvania and of the black population.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me answer the gentleman. I do not suppose that all the property in the South will be confiscated. Our confiscation act contemplates the property only of those who were engaged in armed hostility to the United States.

Mr. ELIOT. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] that there is no distinction made in this bill between the rights of freedmen and of refugees under it. They are treated alike from the first to the last. If the gentleman now desires to make another inquiry of me, I will yield to him.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to know whether the vast white population of the South who were true to the Government, and sought their homes in the hills and mountains and the valleys and caves of that country during the war, are to receive the same consideration upon the part of this House that the other class, who probably unfortunately are black, are now receiving on the part of the gentleman and those concerned with him.

Mr. ELIOT. Exactly the same.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to say that I do not feel inclined to oppose this bill, or to withhold complete protection from people who are colored. I think it is our duty to protect them. I would give them all the advantages that this country can give to them, elevate them and improve them as much as possible. But I must say, if gentlemen will allow me to do so, that the whole argument, all the letters, all the sympathy, and all that is said from one end to the other is alone for the colored people, while our own race is entirely ignored.

Mr. ELIOT. Nevertheless the refugees have all the rights under this bill that the freedmen have, and have been cared for from the beginning by the Commissioner and the assistant commissioners under him, wherever that care has been called for. And I rather incline to think that it will turn out to be true that large numbers—I will not say more than of freedmen—but very large numbers of refugees have derived benefit under this law. Gentlemen around me say that as many refugees as freedmen have been cared for. I am not prepared to say that; but large numbers of them have been cared for.

There may be a difference between the two classes, however, in this respect: there is not one State where these refugees might not perhaps live in comparative safety if this bureau is withdrawn. I do not know that I can say that either. But this is true, that there is not one rebel State where these freedmen could live in safety if the arm of the Government is withheld.

Why, sir, there have been contracts made in different States which are as repugnant to our sense of honor and justice as ever any arrangements under the old slave codes could have been. In the town of Opelousas, Louisiana, some time ago, the following "ordinance relative to the police of recently emancipated negroes or freedmen within the corporate limits of the town of Opelousas" was passed:

Whereas the relations formerly subsisting between master and slave have become changed by the action of the controlling authorities; and whereas it is necessary to provide for the proper police and government of the recently emancipated negroes or freedmen in their new relations to the municipal authorities:

SEC. 1. Be it therefore ordained by the board of police of the town of Opelousas. That no negro or freedman shall be allowed to come within the limits of the town of Opelousas without special permission from his employer, specifying the object of his visit, and the time necessary for the accomplishment of the same. Whoever shall violate this provision shall suffer imprisonment and two days' work on the public streets, or shall pay a fine of $2 50.

SEC. 2. Be it further ordained. That every negro or freedman who shall be found on the streets of Opelousas after ten o'clock at night without a written pass or permit from his employer shall be imprisoned and compelled to work five days on the public streets, or pay a fine of five dollars.

SEC. 3. No negro or freedman shall be permitted to rent or keep a house within the limits of the town under any circumstances; and any one thus offending shall be ejected and compelled to find an employer, or leave the town within twenty-four hours. The lessor or furnisher of the house leased or kept as above shall pay a fine of ten dollars for each offense.

Sec. 4. No negro or freedman shall reside within the limits of the town of Opelousas who is not in the regular service of some white person or former owner, who shall be held responsible for the conduct of said freedman. But said employer or former owner may permit said freedman to hire his time, by special permission in writing, which permission shall not extend over twenty-four hours at any one time. Any one violating the provisions of this section shall be imprisoned and forced to work for two days on the public streets.

Sec. 5. No public meetings or congregations of negroes or freedmen shall be allowed within the limits of the town of Opelousas, under any circumstances or for any purpose, without the permission of the mayor or president of the board. This prohibition is not intended, however, to prevent freedmen from attending the usual church services conducted by established ministers of religion. Every freedman violating this law shall be imprisoned and made to work five days on the public streets.

Sec. 6. No negro or freedman shall be permitted to preach, exhort, or otherwise declaim, to congregations of colored people without a special permission from the mayor or president of the board of police, under the penalty of a fine of ten dollars or twenty days' work on the public streets.

Sec. 7. No freedman who is not in the military services shall be allowed to carry fire-arms, or any kind of weapons, within the limits of the town of Opelousas without the special permission of his employer, in writing, and approved by the mayor or president of the board of police. Any one thus offending shall forfeit his weapons, and shall be imprisoned and made to work five days on the public streets, or pay a fine of five dollars in lieu of said work.

Sec. 8. No freedman shall sell, barter, or exchange any articles of merchandise or traffic within the limits of Opelousas without permission in writing from his employer or the mayor or president of the board, under the penalty of the forfeiture of said articles, and imprisonment and one day's labor, or a fine of one dollar in lieu of said work.

Sec. 9. Any freedman found drunk within the limits of the town shall be imprisoned and made to labor five days on the public streets, or pay five dollars in lieu of said labor.

Sec. 10. Any freedman not residing in Opelousas, who shall be found within its corporate limits after the hour of three o'clock p. m., on Sunday, without a special written permission from his employer or the mayor, shall be arrested and imprisoned and made to work two days on the public streets, or pay two dollars in lieu of said work.

Sec. 11. All the foregoing provisions apply to freedmen and freed women, or both sexes.

Sec. 12. It shall be the special duty of the mayor or president of the board to see that all the provisions of this ordinance are faithfully executed.

Sec. 13. Be it further ordained, That this ordinance is to take effect from and after its first publication. Ordained the 3d day of July, 1865.

E. D. ESTILLETTE,
President of the Board of Police.

JOSEPH D. RICHARD, Clerk.

And I have here upon my table the proceedings of a meeting held in Virginia, at a place called Turkey Island, which was presided over by men of influence and property. That meeting was held within the last month. The following is the published account of their proceedings:

THE JAMES RIVER FARMERS AND THE NEGROES.

On the 5th instant a meeting of the James river farmers was held at Turkey Island, Henrico county, for the purpose of adopting some fixed rules and regulations for the government alike of the farmers themselves and the freedmen employed by them. Colonel Hill Carter, of Shirley, was called to the chair, and Major Charles Pickett appointed secretary. After mature deliberation, the following resolutions were adopted:

1. That toward all freedmen in our employ we will act justly, and that we consider the following rates of wages fair and liberal, and that we pledge ourselves not to exceed them:

2. A first-class field hand shall be paid by the year $130, a first-class field hand shall be paid by the month ten dollars; a second-class field hand shall be paid by the year $105, a second-class field hand shall be paid by the month eight dollars; a third-class field hand shall be paid by the year seventy dollars, a third-class field hand shall be paid by the month five dollars; a first-class woman (field hand) per month five dollars, second-class woman (field hand) per month three dollars.

3. The classes are described as follows: first-class field hand, plowman; second-class field hand, good general farm hand; third-class farm hand, boy or old man.

4. Each hand hired by the year shall have deducted a "per diem" (pro rata) for sickness, holidays, or absence by leave of the employer.

5. Each hand hired by the month shall be subject to the same deduction as those hired by the year, and in addition shall be charged one dollar a month for their fuel during the months of December, January, February, and March.

6. For disobedience of orders or insubordination, each hand will be charged one dollar.

7. For leaving the farm without permission, one dollar will be charged each hand, in addition to the loss of time.

8. Each hand will be held responsible for injury or loss to the stock and farming utensils, if occasioned by negligence, and the amount deducted from his wages.

9. All of the hands will be required to submit to such rules, and work in such way and at such times, either night or day, as was formerly customary in this section of the country. By this it is not meant that the farmers are to make a regular habit of requiring night work, but that they shall require such work only as it has been usual to have done at night.

10. Twenty-six working days shall be considered as a month.

11. The usual attendance on mules, horses, and all other stock will be required on Sundays and holidays.

12. Three quarters of an hour will be allowed for breakfast, and an hour for dinner, except during the months of June, July, and August, when an hour will be allowed for breakfast and an hour and a half for dinner.

13. No hand will be employed who has been discharged for misconduct or violation of contract.

14. Each hand employed by the month shall give his employer ten days' notice of his intention to leave, or forfeit one third of his month's wages.

15. Each hand hired by the year shall be paid quarterly, the employer always keeping the hand one month's wages in arrears.

16. The rations shall be as follows: for men, three pounds of meat per week; for women and boys, two pounds of meat per week, or its equivalent. For men, fifteen pounds of meal per week; for women and boys, twelve pounds of meal per week.

These proceedings were communicated to General Howard by the assistant commissioner of that district, and the following instructions were returned:

"The interests of the freedmen are committed by law to this bureau.

"The spirit and letter of the regulations referred to are diametrically opposed to nearly every circular and order from this office.

"The freedmen referred to in the resolutions are at liberty to enter into just such agreements or contracts as they please, and with whomsoever they please, and they will not be restrained from receiving as high wages as they can get.

"You will please communicate with the gentlemen named in the article, and inform them, and also the freedmen concerned, of the purposes and wishes of the Commissioner as herein set forth."

In Maryland the schools which have been established have been interrupted, and it has been urged that according to the laws of the State those schools must be closed.

In Mississippi houses have been burned and negroes have been murdered. In Alabama a new code, a slave code in fact, has been attempted to be passed, and gentlemen must have seen that in the Marlboro' district, in South Carolina, the planters have recently held meetings and resolved that the military power ought to be withdrawn and the freedmen compelled to work for their old masters. And so the word comes on from one to another of these States, until it is reduced to a certainty that if the arm of the Government is withheld from protecting these men, and the powers of this bureau are not continued and enlarged, much injustice will be done to these freedmen, and there will be no one there to tell the story.

Mr. Speaker, while speaking of the lands on the Sea Islands I intended to refer to the testimony which I have before me, coming from a young woman from my own city, known to me as earnest, intelligent, and cultivated. She went as a teacher to these islands, and her life has already been given a sacrifice in their behalf. From her last report I give this extract, referring to General Howard's visit to them in October last:

"The minds of the people are greatly agitated by the late visit of General Howard and some members of his staff, with two of the former owners on this island. His coming was sudden and unexpected to all. We had heard rumors that some of the former owners were coming back, but did not believe, after the promises made to these people, that they would be allowed to regain their lands on this island. Unfortunately, we did not learn of the meeting held for General Howard till the day after, as we are miles from everybody and everything; but we attended the second held by the people, at which a paper was read, which had been drawn up by a committee from among them, to state their feelings on the subject, and was to be sent to the General. There is but one sentiment. 'We will not work for our former masters,' is the cry from one and all. What troubles them most is, that, if the owners do come back, they, the colored people, will not be allowed to purchase one foot of land. Their longing is to have a homestead; and for this they are willing to work, paying a lawful price.

"At a meeting held this week they decided, if the planters came back, to leave the island. But, poor things, where can they go? General Howard saw plainly their feelings on the subject, and apparently the matter was painful to him. His kind, truthful manner won their confidence and respect. The matter was put to vote: 'How many will work for their former masters?' None, or almost none, raised their hands. He saw how they felt, and asked how many would trust the question to him, feeling that he would do all he could that justice should be done to them. They understood and appreciated his feeling. All raised their hands; and now another man stands in their minds with our dear President Lincoln, General Sherman, and General Saxton—General Howard. The day after the meeting many of the people came to us, asking us to explain things to them saying, they 'had 'n't learning and couldn't understand.' We did the best we could, trying to calm their minds, to hold forth no brighter prospects than we could see ourselves, and to lead them to trust those who had the matter in charge; promising that we would do all that we could for them. It will be terribly cruel if these people are again to flee for freedom. They can, without any question, support themselves, their poor, and their aged, in a year or less, if they have the opportunity, if they have the privilege of buying land, working, and paying for it. Many who have been here for a year have excellent crops of cotton, corn, and rice, which will be ample for their support till the next harvest.

"Last Sunday night, taking my Bible, I went to one of the cabins and read to those who were gathered there the first eight chapters of Exodus; and it was interesting to hear the old men apply the situation of the Israelites, after they were freed from their bondage in Egypt, to their own present situation; and my reading was often interrupted by questions or exclamations. How thankful I was that I was with them, and could in some slight degree assist them—leading them in the first steps of knowledge.

"There is great need of more laborers here—real, earnest workers, working with heart and hand for these needy people."

This bill, Mr. Speaker, has thrown light into the dark places. There has been no oppression that could not be reported to headquarters here by its officers and a remedy applied. Withdraw the bureau and the freedmen will have no friend to stand between them and those who would oppress them.

I have here a copy of a report made to the Union League of Philadelphia, which I believe has been distributed among members of this House. As stating the views held by that league, I call attention to the following paragraph:

"To the freedmen so suddenly liberated by the movements of our armies and the policy of our Government we owe a duty from which we must not turn in the days of our prosperity, but rather make that prosperity a means of adjusting their uncertain position in the land of their early bondage, and of securing to them every blessing that right judgment may decide to belong to a state of absolute liberty. We must not forget the fidelity shown to the nation by this oppressed race in the darkest hours of our history, nor the desperate nature of the services rendered to us when they first arrayed themselves in arms to meet the early contempt of their white comrades and the cold-blooded massacres of our common enemies. A double share of fortitude was necessary to encounter these two great difficulties, and our black soldiers bore both with unflinching manhood. Mere cold justice, if not a more commendable gratitude, should make us the watchful guardians of the present condition and the future prospects of the race which God has confided to our keeping. The perplexities of our guardianship may be vast and disheartening; but we should bear them with the same courage and hopefulness that led this derided people into fields where no quarter was given to their wounded, and where the ready halberd awaited their captured files. The wish of the nation, clearly expressed to our Government, has always been sufficient to shape its policy; and doubtless the voice that arose in the recent elections in the North will reach the wakeful ears of our Representatives at the capital. We trust that it may, and it should be our effort to swell the force and volume of the popular demand."

We know perfectly well the course that has been pursued by that—in fact as well as in name—"Loyal League of Philadelphia." All that I want is that we should reply to the communications which have come from the South and the demands which have come from the North, from Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and from more northern States, from men who have the care of these freedmen at heart, who have devoted time, labor, and money to render such aid as they could that the life of the bureau should be lengthened and its powers enlarged; that we shall legislate so as to make the freedom we have conferred a blessing to them. We have an account to give for our stewardship, not to them alone but to Him who made them and us.

Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to examine the bill more in detail, but I will withhold further remarks at present, holding myself now prepared to give an answer to any gentleman who may be disposed to put to me any inquiry in reference to the character of the bill or the amendments which we have proposed.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to move, or will he himself move, that these amendments be printed?

Mr. ELIOT. I think it would be well, by general consent, to have the substitute printed.

Mr. THAYER. I move, then, that the amendments be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PIKE in the chair.) If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWSON obtained the floor.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. STEVENS. Before my colleague [Mr. DAWSON] goes on, I desire to move, with his consent, that the House meet at half past seven o'clock this evening for the purpose of allowing members to deliver speeches in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the President's message, with the understanding that no other business shall be transacted. Several gentlemen desire an opportunity to speak, and I hope that there will be no objection to my proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has heard the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope now that the House will take a recess till this evening, and give my colleague an opportunity to speak on this bill in the morning.

LAND SURVEYS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish this House with a statement showing, first, the amount paid by the United States for the survey of public lands in the State of California; second, when such surveys of land were made; and third, how much has been received by the Government from the sales of public lands in said State.

INDEX OF EXECUTIVE DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to prepare a digested index of the executive documents and reports of committees of the House of Representatives from 1839 to the close of the present Congress, to correspond with the index of the same documents from the commencement of the Government to the close of the Twenty-Fourth Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not object to this resolution if it is offered simply for reference.

Mr. BANKS. That is all.

There being no objection to the introduction of the resolution,

Mr. BANKS moved that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law a National Board of Trade.

I ask that a letter explanatory of this resolution may be read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

REPRESENTATIVES OF J. E. MARTIN.

Mr. POMEROY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of J. E. Martin, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REBEL PERSECUTIONS IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kentucky, asking relief from persecution and maltreatment by the rebels in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HANS SEIVERS.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Hans Seivers, a private in company A, fourteenth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT JAIL.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the comfort and safety of the inmates of the jail in the District of Columbia, and make their labor available, so as to reduce the expenses to the Government, and report by bill or otherwise.

And then, on motion of Mr. THAYER, (at five minutes to four o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at half past seven o'clock p. m., (Mr. GRINNELL in the chair.)

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is very evident, from present indications, that the House is going to be thin to-night. It is known to all that the President gives a reception, and I suppose that members are absent this evening for the purpose of attending it; and in order to give the few now here an opportunity also to attend it, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 2,

The SPEAKER pro tempore voted in the affirmative; and the motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at seven o'clock and thirty-three minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 31, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 9, 1865, a copy of the record of a board of Navy officers appointed to inquire into and determine how much the vessels of war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price and allowances for extra work; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication addressed to that Department on the 4th of November last by the Quartermaster General of the United States Army, and a report thereon by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, respecting the great overland trail from Leavenworth west; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Houston, Texas, praying for the construction of a railroad across the Indian Territory, from the south line of Kansas to the Red river; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of persons engaged in the coal trade upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and their tributaries, praying that the enrollment acts of the United States may be so amended as to exempt from their provisions all coal-boats, coal-barges, and coal-flats which are used exclusively for carrying coal to market and not as common carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of M. N. Radovich, praying payment for the charter of his boat Diana from April 27, 1862, to October 28, 1862, taken possession of by order of Admiral D. G. Farragut at New Orleans, for the conveyance of troops, and for payment for the value of the boat, it having been lost in the Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of persons engaged in the coal trade on the Ohio river, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of that river between Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Buffington Island, West Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a memorial of citizens of Orono, Maine, remonstrating against the renewal of the so-called reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BROWN presented resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Kansas City in that State, connecting northwest Missouri with Galveston, Texas, and also of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the southwest branch of the Pacific railroad from the western boundary of Missouri to the Pacific ocean; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. MORGAN presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in favor of an appropriation for the erection in the bay of New York of a hospital for the reception of sick, and warehouses for the storage of goods and merchandise arriving in the port of New York in vessels subject to quarantine; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the petition of William C. Anderson, jr., of Missouri, praying for the passage of an act to enable him to settle the accounts of the late William C. Anderson, pension agent at St. Louis, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of the officers and members of the Mining Board of Gilpin county, Colorado, remonstrating against the passage of any law affecting the present status of mining claims and titles; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. YATES presented a petition of photographers of Jacksonville and Springfield, Illinois, praying for a repeal of the law requiring the use of stamps on photographs, and for a reduction of their license fee; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NYE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Nevada, in favor of a grant of lands and money to aid in the construction of the San Francisco and Washoe railroad and the Placerville and Sacramento railroad; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I present, Mr. President, with pleasure, the petition of one hundred and twenty-four beautiful, accomplished, and intelligent ladies of the city of Lawrence, Kansas, praying for an amendment of the Constitution that shall prohibit the several States from disfranchising any of their citizens on account of sex. As the petition is very brief and respectfully worded, I ask that a gallant Senate may hear it read.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the following petition:

A PETITION FOR UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned, women of the United States, respectfully ask an amendment of the Constitution that shall prohibit the several States from disfranchising any of their citizens on the ground of sex.

In making our demand for suffrage, we would call your attention to the fact that we represent fifteen million people—one half the entire population of the country—intelligent, virtuous, native-born American citizens; and yet stand outside the pale of political recognition.

The Constitution classes us as "free people," and counts us whole persons in the basis of representation; and yet are we governed without our consent, compelled to pay taxes without appeal, and punished for violations of law without choice of judge or juror.

The experience of all ages, the declarations of our fathers, the statute laws of our own day, and the fearful revolution through which we have just passed, all prove the uncertain tenure of life, liberty, and property so long as the ballot—the only weapon of self-protection—is not in the hand of every citizen.

Therefore, in harmony with advancing civilization, placing new safeguards round the individual rights of four million emancipated slaves, we ask that you extend the right of suffrage to woman, the only remaining class of disfranchised citizens, and thus fulfill your constitutional obligation "to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

As all partial application of republican principles must ever breed a complicated legislation as well as a discontented people, we would pray your honorable body, in order to simplify the machinery of Government and insure domestic tranquillity, that you legislate hereafter for persons, citizens, tax-payers, and not for class or caste.

For justice and equality your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The committee that is considering the subject of extending the right of suffrage to the blacks, the male blacks of the United States, it seems to me is the proper one to which to refer the petition of the white women of the United States upon that subject. I therefore move that the petition be referred with a letter that I have here and now send to the desk, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of Robert R. Collier, a citizen of Virginia, residing at Petersburg, who asks Congress to pass an act by virtue of which the State in which he resides, Virginia, may be authorized to elect members of Congress, so that the State may be restored to her former practical relations to and in the Federal Union; and also that it may be relieved of the so-called civil State government which the people did not inaugurate, and the enactments of whose Legislature the military power overrides and sets at naught. This is a petition from a single citizen, but one of considerable eminence in his State, and who by his writings has latterly done much to illustrate the relations between the States and the national Government. I move its reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of William Cornell Jewett, in which he sets forth that he has been opposed to the freedom of the slave, but now maintains that if free as a result of the war and by common consent, the colored freeman is upon an equality with the white man, and he calls upon Congress by appropriate legislation to see that that principle is enforced. I move the reference of this to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. CLARK. I ask that Lemuel Worster have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate, with the view of presenting them in the House of Representatives, where he has a petition for a pension, there having been no adverse report, but on the contrary a favorable report.

Leave was granted.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of J. S. Merrill, praying for a settlement of his accounts as quartermaster and commissary of the fifth regiment Maine volunteers, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of A. T. Spencer and G. S. Hubbard, of Chicago, praying for compensation for services performed in carrying the mails on their line of steamers between Chicago and the ports on Lake Superior, reported a bill (S. No. 114) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Jane W. Nethaway, praying for an allowance of back pay and bounty claimed to be due her late husband, and also to be allowed a pension, reported a bill (S. No. 115) for the relief of Jane W. Nethaway; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Osage county, Missouri, praying that a pension be granted to Parellee Howerton, widow of Stern W. Howerton, who was killed by the rebels during Price's raid in that State in October, 1864, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Sophia Schemmel-finnig, widow of General Alexander Schemmel-finnig, praying for an increase of pension, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of widows of Navy officers, praying for an increase of pension, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, praying that pensions may be granted to the sufferers by the explosion at the Allegheny arsenal on the 17th of September, 1862, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of the 26th instant to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to the widows and minor children of enlisted men who were enlisted or detailed as artificers, reported a bill (S. No. 116) to extend the benefit of the pension laws to artificers; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of the United States, praying that each common school in the Union be furnished with the President's annual message and accompanying documents, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, which is better capable of judging of the expense of furnishing these documents to all the common schools of the country than any other committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 6) supplying appropriate legislation to enforce the amendment of the Constitution prohibiting slavery, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. The committee have reported upon that subject, and a bill is now pending before the Senate embracing the subject-matter of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the bill? Let the title be read.

The Secretary read the title as follows: A bill supplying appropriate legislation to enforce the amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the indefinite postponement of the bill?

Mr. SUMNER. Let it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie over, objection being made to its present consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 19) to warrant and confirm the land titles of grantees under the field orders of Major General Sherman, at Savannah, January 16, 1865, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, as the Senate has already acted on that subject. If there be no objection, I ask for present action on the report with a view to have the bill removed from the Calendar.

The report was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 55) to maintain and enforce the freedom of the inhabitants of the United States, have instructed me to make a similar report in reference to that bill, the subject-matter of it being embraced in other bills upon which the Senate has acted or which are now pending before it.

The report was concurred in; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of John Baird, minor heir of Cornelius Baird, and others, praying for a bounty land warrant of one hundred and sixty acres for services in the war of 1812, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 44) to incorporate the National Protection Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 42) to amend an act to incorporate the Guardian Society and reform juvenile offenders in the District of Columbia, approved July 1, 1862, also to amend an act granting certain privileges to the Guardian Society, approved June 30, 1864, have instructed me to report it back and to move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Captain F. A. Patterson, late of the third Virginia cavalry, praying for compensation from the date of his commission until the time his regiment was mustered into the service, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 117) for the relief of F. A. Patterson, late captain of the third Virginia cavalry. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, copies of accounts of Indian agents Harlan and Snow, of the southern superintendency, for the first quarter of 1865, reported it back, with a recommendation that the report of the Secretary of the Interior and accompanying papers be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating copies of the accounts of the superintendent and agents having charge of the Creeks, Chickasaws, Seminoles, and Wichitas for the second quarter of the year 1865, reported it back with a recommendation that it be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of the accounts of the superintendent and agents having in charge the refugee Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Seminoles, for the first quarter of 1865, reported it back with a recommendation that it be printed.

The report was agreed to.

REVENUE COMMISSION REPORTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution to print five thousand copies of the revenue commission for the use of the Senate, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the general and special reports of the revenue commission, exclusive of the forms of bills accompanying the same, be printed for the use of the Senate.

VOTE OF THANKS TO ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay on the 5th August, 1864, to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. I presume it will be quite agreeable to the Senate to pass this joint resolution through its various stages at once, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution on the day it is reported.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which declares that the thanks of Congress are eminently due, and are hereby tendered, to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut of the United States Navy; the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for the unsurpassed gallantry and skill exhibited by them in the engagement in Mobile bay, and for their long and faithful service and unswerving devotion to the cause of the country in the midst of the greatest difficulties and dangers. The President of the United States is to communicate this resolution to Vice Admiral Farragut, and the Secretary of the Navy to the officers, seamen, and marines of the Navy by a general order of his Department.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 118) in relation to public highways; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 118) to regulate suffrage and elections in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 119) granting lands to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Fort Gibson Railroad Company to aid in extending their railroad and telegraph line from the southern boundary of Kansas to the northern boundary of Texas, in the direction of Galveston bay; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 120) to grant one million acres of public lands for the benefit of a mining college in the State of Nevada; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 121) to provide for the enlargement of the Winnebago reservation in the Territory of Nebraska, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 154) to further secure American citizens certain privileges under the treaty of Washington;

A bill (H. R. No. 184) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and revenue cutters; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States.

SALE OF STAMPS AND ENVELOPES.

Mr. DIXON. I believe Senate bill No. 71 is the order for the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. DIXON. I should be glad to have that bill taken up at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to take up the bill No. 71.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on Post Offices to insert after the word "required" in the fourth line of the first section the words "until the 30th day of June, 1868."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NYE. The bill has been modified since yesterday, and I ask for the reading of the bill as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible that the bill should have been modified except by the Senate.

Mr. NYE. Is there not a proposed modification?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the committee to the first section of the bill, and upon that question the Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. The chairman of the committee has prepared a modification of the bill as an amendment.

Mr. DIXON. I propose to withdraw the amendment which was pending before the Senate, and to offer in lieu of it a substitute for the entire bill, which I believe will receive the assent of the Senator from Nevada. I ask leave to withdraw the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator, by direction of the committee, can withdraw the amendment. The amendment having been reported by the committee, if the committee request that it be withdrawn, it can be withdrawn. It is under control of the committee.

Mr. DIXON. I have the assent of the committee for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, then, is withdrawn.

Mr. DIXON. I now propose, by the assent of the committee, the following as a substitute for the entire bill, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever in his opinion the public service shall require, until the 30th day of June, 1868, to deposit postage stamps and stamped envelopes with such persons as he may select for sale. The persons with whom stamps and stamped envelopes are so deposited shall engage to sell and circulate the same under the instructions of the Postmaster General, and shall give bond in such sum as the Postmaster General may direct, with one or more sureties, conditioned for the faithful keeping of the stamps and stamped envelopes so entrusted to them, and for the payment to the Post Office Department, in such manner as directed by the Postmaster General, of the moneys arising from the sale thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General may allow to any such depositaries, under the provisions of this act, a commission not exceeding five per cent. on all sales of stamps and stamped envelopes by them made, and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department shall audit and settle all such accounts. Such persons shall be deemed receivers and custodians of public money. They shall not sell stamps or stamped envelopes on credit, but shall sell them invariably for coin or United States Treasury notes, and at a price not exceeding the price of such stamps and stamped envelopes as provided by law. They shall be subject to all the pains, penalties, fines, and forfeitures now provided by law in cases of receivers and custodians of public money and of postmasters and other persons to whom the sale of stamps and stamped envelopes is intrusted.

Mr. CLARK. I think that bill had better be laid over until to-morrow, and printed, so that we can see what is the effect of this amendment. It is equivalent to a new draft; and it is very difficult to understand it as it is without seeing it in print.

Mr. CONNESS. It only changes it in a few words.

Mr. CLARK. I understand there is no objection to this postponement on the part of the chairman. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 154) to further secure American citizens certain privileges under the treaty of Washington—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (H. R. No. 184) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and revenue cutters—to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the resolution lie upon the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move the postponement of all prior orders, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 135, to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes. This bill passed the House of Representatives, was referred to the Senate Committee on Commerce, was reported favorably, and passed the Senate, and by my motion to reconsider remains in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Rhode Island, the motion on which it is pending being that the Senate reconsider its vote on the passage of that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether that motion is now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to take up the subject. The question is, will the Senate now take up the subject indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island; that is, will the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider? The motion to reconsider was entered some days since, on the 26th of January, as the record shows. On the same day that the bill was passed the motion to reconsider was entered. A motion now to take up that subject is in order.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider Mr. SPRAGUE's motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 135) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes, was passed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. This bill, Mr. President, provides in its first section—

That on and after the passage of this act, and until the 1st day of April, 1866, any goods, wares, or merchandise under bond, in any public or private bonded warehouse, upon which the duties are unpaid, may be withdrawn for consumption, and the bonds canceled, on payment of the duties and charges prescribed by law; and any goods, wares, or merchandise deposited in bond, in any public or private bonded warehouse, on and after the 1st day of April aforesaid, and all goods, wares, or merchandise remaining in warehouse, under bond, on said 1st day of April, may be withdrawn for consumption within one year from the date of original importation, on payment of the duties and charges to which they may be subject by law at the time of such withdrawal; and after the expiration of one year from the date of original importation, and until the expiration of three years from said date, any goods, wares, or merchandise, in bond as aforesaid, may be withdrawn for consumption on payment of the duties assessed on the original entry and charges, and an additional duty of ten per cent. of the amount of such duties and charges.

And the second section provides—

That neither this nor any other act shall operate to prevent the exportation of bonded goods, wares, or merchandise from warehouse within three years from the date of original importation, nor their transportation in bond from the port into which they were originally imported to any other port or ports for the purpose of exportation; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

This bill, Mr. President, was referred to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, by them reported favorably, and passed on that report by this body. Heretofore propositions for the extension of the time of the withdrawal of goods from bonded warehouse have been referred to the Committee on Finance, and by them reported to the Senate. In this case the bill, contrary to the usual practice, was sent to the Committee on Commerce. It was called up in the morning hour, and passed without attention being attracted to it. Soon after the passage of the bill, not knowing its contents, I moved that it be reconsidered, and I had the motion for reconsideration entered for the purpose of giving me an opportunity to examine the bill. I have consulted with members of the committee as to the investigation which it received from them, and could get no satisfactory explanation as to the merits or design of the bill, except that it was favorably considered in the other House, and that in consequence of that it was deemed proper that it should be passed here. In my opinion, the Senate and the country are not aware that this bill has for its object the lessening of the revenues upon a variety of articles fifteen per cent.

The present law requires that goods deposited in warehouse shall be withdrawn within three months, or if they are kept there longer than three months and withdrawn within two years, an additional duty of twenty-five per cent. is levied upon them. This bill provides that the importer shall have one year instead of three months, and if they are not withdrawn within that time he may keep them there three years instead of two, and pay an additional duty of ten per cent. instead of twenty-five per cent. Here, sir, a measure, affecting more particularly than any other that I know of before the Senate at this session every industrial interest of our people, is passed by this body and by the other House with little or no consideration, although it not only affects the material interests of the whole people, but seriously affects the public revenue. My object this morning is to have this bill, situated as it is, reconsidered and referred to the Finance Committee of the Senate to be by them considered in connection with the great questions of revenue that are about to be presented to them. I do not believe that the people of this country will look with any leniency upon transactions which affect them so materially being disposed of with so little consideration as this bill has received from this distinguished body.

I stand here, sir, with great deference and with a want of confidence in my own ability to present to the attention of the Senate those great questions which have occupied the time and attention of generations past, and of men whom I am not competent in the slightest degree to follow. But, sir, I feel that this is another encroachment upon the industry of the people of this country. While we have constant foreign encroachments upon our industry, here is an attack from our internal foes. Which of these powers, that without or that within, is most destructive to our interests remains for some other time and some other person to determine. I am not able to do it.

This measure has no other purpose undoubtedly but to favor foreign commerce, in opposition to domestic commerce, to agriculture, to manufactures, to the mechanic arts, to every interest of our country that engages the attention and occupies the industry of the American people. It remains for the Senate to determine which of these interests it is the most proper for them to consider favorably—on the one side all the interests in which all our people are engaged, or on the other side that one interest which engages the foreign commerce of the country; the interest of the few individuals engaged in the importation of goods from foreign countries, or the interests of the great mass of the American people.

Upon this subject of manufactures I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a moment while I consider and endeavor to prove that the success of the manufacturing and mechanical interests of the country tends to an increased price of the raw material of the people, and to lessen the price of their mechanical and manufacturing products, in opposition to the free-trade idea that by free trade you effect similar purposes. It is within my recollection when the great crop of this country, its great commodity, was in the hands of foreign capitalists, when to all intents and purposes free trade occupied the minds and attention of the American people, and they assented to it as being the most beneficial policy that they would have Congress carry into effect.

It is within my recollection that for a long time the product of cotton netted to its producer from four and a half to six cents a pound. What was the cause of that low price for that product? Simply because it was in the hands of the foreign capitalist, controlled by him at the time it was produced; and the result was, instead of a profit to the producer, a loss. What was the consequence? The American manufacturer, poor, weak at that time, had to come into the market and sell his product upon four, six, twelve, or sometimes eighteen or twenty-four month's credit. The producer of cotton at that time was unable to purchase for cash, for the reason that his crop brought nothing by which he could purchase the necessary articles to enable him to produce it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that the Senator from Illinois who has charge of that bill will allow the order of the day to lie over until my colleague shall have finished his remarks.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection if this matter will not take long.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I shall only occupy a few moments longer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I have no objection to the special order being laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday will be laid aside by common consent.

Mr. SPRAGUE. By and by the American manufacturer gathered strength, so that at the beginning of this war, instead of consuming but a small portion of the cotton crop of this country, he consumed a quarter of it. The result was that cotton, instead of being six cents a pound, sold for eleven and twelve cents a pound, and instead of the American manufacturer selling to the producer of cotton his goods on twelve, eighteen, or twenty-four months' credit, he sold for four or six months' credit. This was as plainly the result of the manufacturing of cotton in this country as it is possible that human knowledge can determine one thing to be the result of another.

While I am on the floor I desire simply to put from the mind of the Senate and the country the idea that there are only manufacturing interests in this country that have become profitable within the last six months. We are told that the enormous dividends growing out of the carrying on of manufacturing business in this country are a consequence of high tariffs and of exclusive and class legislation. The manufacturers, whenever the question is touched, feel that the present profits may not continue, and they are reluctant that any one shall agitate the question. But, sir, I do not care for the capitalist engaged in the manufacturing of this country. Capital will seek its own investments and find its own rewards. What I desire to promote is a permanent industrial interest in our country. What I desire to promote is profitable occupation for the people who are now under the flag; and by making every industrial occupation profitable, I desire to bring under the folds of the flag nations of the world who are now under a Government and a flag less favorable to popular interests than our own. I believe that I shall sooner destroy the influence of European aggressions upon liberty and upon property in a popular Government by drawing from them their people and their skill, and protecting it here, than by any warlike operations, however successfully they might be prosecuted. Sir, I stand upon that position, I advocate that principle—peace with all the world with honor, but occupying an aggressive stand-point to draw from all nations that which is good, skill in all departments of human industry, make it for their interest to come here and enjoy the benefits which free institutions give. This is, in my opinion, the genius of the American people.

One other point. Lord Chatham, while he lived, was, by those whom we have succeeded, deemed to be the friend of the American people, the friend of the then American colonies. In open Parliament he constantly warned the Government of Great Britain that the policy which was then being pursued would, if continued, deprive England of the principal jewel in her crown, as it did. His warning had no effect. But, sir, while he was thus advocating the interests of the American colonies, what did he say? He declared that if America manufactured as much as a stocking or forged a hob nail, he would be for putting the whole power of the British nation upon her. While he advocated peace with America on the one side, he was for war with her if she attempted to be independent of the industrial interests of Great Britain. And, sir, during the last hours that he lived, in that same Parliament, after the nation he loved so well had spent five hundred millions of gold to destroy the power of the colonies and bring them again into dependence upon Great Britain, he advocated still peace with the colonies. "Withdraw your armies," said he; "make terms with them so that we may renew our old relations. With them it is the same as with us. The laws of Great Britain are such as to positively prohibit the Americans from manufacturing a dollar's worth; we will do that business for them;" and that policy has been continued wherever it could be introduced.

Sir, if the policy of free trade is right for this country why not have it in its full effect? Look at Canada with hardly a spinning-wheel, with hardly a spindle, with hardly a blacksmith shop or a machine shop, with hardly anything to occupy her people. What do those people do? Whenever there is prosperity on this side of the line, as there almost always is, they find prosperous and remunerative occupation here. They come here to enjoy the results of the benefits which our institutions give to our people.

Mr. President, the effect of the bill which I have now brought to the attention of the Senate is to raise the price of every article which we do not produce in this country. It obliges the consumer to pay a higher price than he otherwise would. Quantities of any one article, for instance, may be imported and kept in bond. A small portion is put upon the market, enough to regulate the price. If there are any domestic manufacturers who have not the Government as an indorser, they must sell; they cannot hold their goods. The price of the foreign article is put a little lower. The price of the domestic article falls also, until the domestic manufacturer is driven from the market. Then there is a scarcity produced, and soon the foreigner raises his price, unloads, and goes on again. This system is constantly repeated.

The working of the warehouse system is this: the Government and the importer join together in a speculation; the Government advances for one year the amount of the duties without interest; the importer, the cost of the goods and the expense of their transportation to the market; the Government gives one year's credit, receiving nothing in return. If the speculation is not profitable enough to close up the business of the partnership within one year, then the Government gives two years more; and if three years elapse before the business is closed, the Government has loaned to the importer at three per cent. per annum. That is the bill. What effect does this have? It speculates upon the necessities of the people, and the Government affords facilities for that speculation. This is all that any speculation ever does. Men with means buy up all of a given commodity and then compel the people who must or will have it to pay the price they demand.

The Government does this without any chance of a profit. Will not the goods be held out of the market if the cost or a great part of the cost is carried without interest, or if with interest a very inconsiderable interest? Such is the effect of this bill; and if it is so, no one can say that it ought to pass. It deprives the Government of fifteen per cent. upon every pound of tea, coffee, or West India product, nine times out of ten, as the goods remain in bond over the one year. If such is the case it ought not to pass.

As I said in the beginning, my object in moving the reconsideration of this bill is simply to draw the attention of the proper committee of the Senate to the importance of the measure, which I believe was passed without due consideration. I believe it will be far more satisfactory to the people of the country and far more satisfactory to the members of the Senate to know that an important measure like this, affecting the material and industrial interests of the whole country, depriving the Government of an income when it needs it so much, and making it tributary to speculations upon the industrial interests of the country, if it is to be passed at all, has at least received the consideration of the most important committee of this body prior to its becoming a law. I trust, therefore, that the motion I have made will prevail; that the bill will be reconsidered; and that it will be referred to the Committee on Finance. That is all I ask for.

Mr. MORGAN. If there was any real danger, such as seems to be apprehended by my friend, the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, I should act and vote with him; but, sir, there is no danger whatever. The bill is plain, direct, and in no sense inimical to the interests of the American manufacturer. I have listened with some degree of attention to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, but I have heard nothing which in any degree changes my mind, or which should change the mind of any one in relation to this bill. If we really are, as we are supposed to be and as we ought to be, and as I hope we are, seeking a common object; if we are endeavoring so to construct our national statutes as that they shall be beneficial alike to all classes of the community, then there is not the slightest difficulty in relation to this measure.

Under existing laws, the importer of foreign merchandise is permitted to deposit his goods in public store or bonded warehouse and enter them for consumption at any time within a period of twelve months. If he fails to enter them during twelve months, he cannot then enter them for consumption, and his only redress is to reexport them, by which the Government loses all the duties, or to come to Congress and ask for an extension of the time, which has been frequently granted; or he can export them, as he sometimes does, to the nearest and least expensive port, and then reimport them, when of course they will again become subject to the laws of the United States and can again remain in the bonded warehouse. All this is an unnecessary expense. The Secretary of the Treasury, in concert with a committee of the House of Representatives, has thought it best that the Government should retain some portion of this expense if it is to be incurred. Consequently this bill contains a clause—and the bill meets entirely the approval of the Treasury Department—requiring the importer to pay an additional duty of ten per cent. provided he does not enter his goods within twelve months; in other words, the money that is to be paid out by the importer for the expenses of exporting and reimporting is to be retained by the Government. That is the bill as I understand it. It is not essentially different from the laws we already have in relation to the American manufacturer. The American manufacturer is not required to pay his duty until his goods are sold. I have had occasion to refer to the laws on the subject, and I will read first an extract from the act of June 30, 1864, "to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," as follows:

"That upon the amounts, quantities, and values of produce, goods, wares, merchandise, and articles produced or manufactured, and sold or delivered, hereinafter enumerated, the manufacturer or producer thereof, whether manufactured or produced for himself or for others, shall pay to the collector of internal revenue within his district, monthly, or on or before a day to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the duties on such products or manufactures."

Again, in another section it is provided:

"And where such goods, wares, and merchandise have been removed for consumption or for delivery to others, or placed on shipboard, or are no longer within the custody or control of the manufacturer or his agent, not being in his factory, store, or warehouse, the value shall be estimated at the average of the market value of the like goods, wares, and merchandise at the time when the same became liable to duty."

Again, in another section of the bill it is provided:

"That upon the articles, goods, wares, and merchandise hereinafter mentioned, except where otherwise provided, which shall be produced and sold, or be manufactured or made and sold, or be consumed or used by the manufacturer or producer thereof, or removed for consumption, or for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturer or producer within the United States or Territories thereof, there shall be levied, collected, and paid," &c.

Then, again in the act of March 3, 1865, amendatory of the act of June 30, 1864, it is provided:

"That manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, may be transferred, without payment of the duty, to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations, under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds, or other security, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, said bonds or other security to be taken by the collector of the district from which such removal is made; and may be transported from such a warehouse to a bonded warehouse used for the storage of merchandise, at any port of entry, and may be withdrawn from bonded warehouse for consumption on payment of the duty, or removed for export to a foreign country without payment of duty, in conformity with the provisions of law relating to the removal of distilled spirits."

The eleventh section of the same act provides:

"That lucifer or friction matches, and cigar lights and wax-tapers, may be transferred, without payment of duty, directly from the place of manufacture to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations; and upon the execution of such transportation bonds, or other security, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, said bonds to be taken by the collector in the district from which such removal is made, and may be withdrawn therefrom for consumption after affixing the stamps thereto, as provided by the act to which this act is an amendment, or may be removed therefrom for export to a foreign country without payment of duty or affixing stamps thereto, in conformity with the provisions of the act aforesaid, relating to the removal of distilled spirits."

In addition to this authority given to the manufacturer, I understand it is customary for the manufacturer only to pay the duties as he wishes to sell his goods. At any rate, the law here seems to give such an authority. But if there was a discrimination between the internal revenue law and the law for collecting duties on foreign imports, it would be for Congress to consider it. This bill is in all respects just, and it ought not to be reconsidered. It has the approval of the Treasury Department; and although my friend from Rhode Island seemed to intimate that there was a conspiracy between the Secretary of the Treasury and the importers of the country, I think he was entirely mistaken in his fears. Nor have I been able to see how the revenues of the country are to be lessened by this measure. It will be, under certain circumstances, an accommodation. It will save the importers the necessity of coming to Congress and asking for special laws. It will save them, as I have said before, from the necessity of exporting their property and then reimporting it, and thus will avoid an unnecessary expense. But the bill, should it become a law, will not be availed of to any very great extent. It is not to the advantage of the importing merchants to keep their goods three years or one year in the bonded warehouse. That is only done on rare occasions, at times when trade is very much depressed. For instance, two years since, when the Congress of the United States passed a law in one day through both Houses raising the duties fifty per cent., it would have been very unjust, indeed, if there had not been then a law to allow goods to be placed in public stores, for during the same session of Congress that duty was entirely removed in some cases.

Mr. POMEROY. I have only had my attention called to this bill quite recently; but it occurs to me that we ought not to make a law deranging the adjustment which the Committee on Finance supposed they had fixed in the bill of last year, at least without their consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that this bill will be laid aside and —

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my friend will excuse me for a moment, I think I can make a suggestion which will perhaps be agreed to, and save any further trouble on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOOT in the chair.) Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir. I was merely going to call for the order of the day, with a view of getting rid of this matter, as it is likely to lead to a long debate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know, sir, but that this bill is all right. I wish to state, however, that when it passed I had not read it. The question came up here about referring it to the Committee on Commerce, and it struck me at the time that it ought to go to the Committee on Finance; but that direction being given to it, I said it might as well go there. At that time I was under the impression—I was told—that it simply provided a remedy for certain persons who had by accident omitted to withdraw their goods for consumption within the time limited by the law and wished to do so. On looking at it, however, I find that it contains other provisions, and quite material provisions, it may be. I have not looked at them, nor have the Committee on Finance; and I suggest to my friend from New York whether it would not be as well to let it be reconsidered and go to the Committee on Finance. We can then consider it, and if the bill is all right we can report it back in a short time.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer not to have it reconsidered and referred.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then, instead of continuing this matter longer to-day, I think it might as well go over, in order that we may have an opportunity of examining it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order of the day having been suspended by common consent, it is subject to the call of any member of the Senate, and objection being made to the further consideration of the pending question, the regular order of the day is before the Senate.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to say one word on this question prior to its going over, and I will ask the indulgence of the Senator from Illinois for just one moment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Rhode Island sees that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] has the floor, and if any Senator is allowed to go on others will insist on speaking. This matter will come up again.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not insist on occupying the floor to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order of the day is now before the Senate, being Senate bill No. 61.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] to the first section of the bill, and upon that question the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled the floor.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I desire to withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and to offer another in lieu of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is competent for the Senator to do so, no action having been taken upon it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Then I withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and in lieu of it move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "Power" the words "and Indians holding lands in severally by allotment." With the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, I will state to the Senate the evil that my amendment is intended to cure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. If it does not occupy too much time, I will yield.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will not insist upon explaining it now.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to give way if the Senator wishes to explain it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I can do it at some other time.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary who reported this bill pronounced it to be probably the most important bill that has been before Congress since the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution at the last session. I agree with him entirely in his estimate of the importance of this measure. Indeed, I doubt whether a measure of more importance has at any time been presented to the consideration of Congress. The honorable Senator introduced two measures which he himself considered, and which have generally been treated, as parts of the same system—the bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the bill now under consideration, "to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication."

These two bills, like the Siamese twins, came into the world together, and they were connected together by something like the umbilical cord that connected those two denizens of Asia who have taken up their residence upon the western continent. I have heard it said by some anatomists that if that cord was ever severed, the twins would die. I trust, if that would be the lamentable fate that would attend Cheng and his brother, that the umbilical cord that connects these two measures may be severed and that each of them may meet the fate, as anatomists predict of the Siamese twins upon a similar catastrophe.

I believe the honorable Senator, however, does not contemplate that these two bills shall be permanently united together. He declared that the first bill, to enlarge the power of the Freedmen's Bureau, was intended to be temporary in its existence and its operation. Whether it will be temporary or not, I suppose will depend upon the uses that may be made of it by the party in power in the future, and the necessity of those uses to themselves, according to the judgment of that party.

I propose to confine my attention, in the remarks which I am now about to make, to the proposition of amendment and the amendment to the amendment. However, the amendment to the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] is not of any very material importance; but the bill as it was reported from the committee, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, I estimate of all the importance which he himself does, although he is the putative father of the measure.

The amendment now before the Senate proposes to declare all the negroes in the United States citizens of the United States. The honorable Senator from Illinois plays for three pockets in this bill. The first is, the bill itself, and the first and second sections, essentially, upon which he relies to confer upon the free negroes all the civil rights that under our Government appertain and belong to white citizens. The second pocket for which he is playing is this amendment, which simply proposes in a few summary words to enact that all free negroes born in the United States shall be held to be citizens, and consequently that they shall have all the rights and privileges of citizens. But the honorable Senator has still another pocket in reserve, which he announced the day before yesterday, and it is this: that these negroes, having been born in the United States of America, by that fact, and by the operation of our Constitution, would thereby be American citizens. If the latter proposition be true, I ask the honorable Senator, where is the necessity of troubling this Senate with the consideration and the decision of either of these other propositions? But I suppose gentlemen are admonished by experience, and they intend to use the same providence and throw wide their net in relation to the objects of this bill as they did in relation to the subject of negro slavery generally. They first had the proclamation of the President of the United States declaring that all slaves in the rebel States were made free. They then had the act of Congress liberating the wives and children of all negro soldiers; and, eventually, they had the amendment to the Constitution. I did not deem either of the first measures of the least importance, because I held that they were legally and constitutionally invalid; but when it came to an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which abolished slavery in the whole United States, I was disposed to concede its validity.

I shall now proceed to make a few remarks upon the amendment that is now under consideration, offered by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. It involves the subject of naturalization under the Government and laws of the United States. There are, in my opinion, three modes by which naturalization may take place: one is by birth, not by the birth of negroes, but by the birth of white people; another is by being naturalized according to a uniform rule to be prescribed by Congress in conformity to the power vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States; and the third is by treaty. I was interested by some conversation between the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] and other Senators yesterday evening as to what had been the effect of the treaty for the acquisition of Florida, and other treaties that acquired foreign territory to the United States and brought in the inhabitants of those foreign territories. It was simply, in relation to citizenship, to make all the residents of the acquired territory who chose to continue their residence there after the territory was attached to the United States, citizens thereof. Then it follows that the Government of the United States, being authorized by the Constitution to negotiate treaties for the acquisition of foreign territory, as an incident to the treaty-making power, all the residents of that territory who choose to remain in it when it is incorporated and comes under the jurisdiction of the United States are, by the effect and operation of the treaty-making power, made citizens. That is a very plain matter. I do not see any difficulty in that to excite the inquiry or the cogitations of profound lawyers, constitutional or statutory. It simply amounts to this: that where the treaty-making power brings in a portion of foreign territory, all the inhabitants who come in with that territory are, by the treaty-making power, made citizens. There is an end to that matter then. It cannot be widened; it cannot be deepened; it cannot be confused nor obscured. The matter of citizenship is imported in the power and in its exercise just as any other appendage of the treaty would also be imported by the treaty-making power.

There is then but one other mode, according to my understanding of the Constitution, in which a citizen can be made by law or by artificial means; and that is in conformity to a uniform rule of naturalization established by Congress. The honorable Senator from Maryland and the honorable Senator from Illinois spoke of special acts of Congress being passed to admit the Stockbridge Indians, and other tribes of Indians, as citizens of the United States. According to my judgment, those laws passed inadvertently, without due consideration. They were attempts, by special acts of Congress, to make citizens, when the Constitution expressly declares that citizens shall be made only according to a uniform rule to be established by Congress.

That leads me step by step to the consideration of the main matter in this question: upon what description of persons does the power of Congress to make citizens operate? Who are the people who, by the exercise of the power of Congress, either in declaring a uniform rule of naturalization, or, if you please, by the passage of a special act, are to be admitted into citizenship? I deny that a negro or any white person born in the United States can be admitted to citizenship in that mode. It is not upon the native-born, black or white, that the power of naturalization under this Government operates. It operates upon foreigners; it operates upon people who are either born out of the United States or who have gone out of the United States, and have assumed the relationship of obedience and fealty to a foreign Government or a foreign potentate. What powers exercised the right to make citizens before the present Constitution was adopted? Each State for itself. Whom did they make citizens of? Not of any native-born of the country, but invariably of foreigners, and nobody else but foreigners. I challenge the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to show me an instance from our history where a native-born person of the United States was ever admitted to citizenship by any of the States before the adoption of the present Constitution unless that native-born person went to a foreign country and there assumed the relation of subject or citizen to that foreign country.

I state this further proposition: there never was a colony before the Declaration of Independence and there never was a State after the Declaration of Independence up to the time of the adoption of the Constitution, so far as I have been able to learn by the slight historical examination which I have given to the subject, that ever made or attempted to make any other person than a person who belonged to one of the nationalities of Europe a citizen. I invoke the chairman of the committee to give me an instance, to point to any history or any memento, where a negro, although that negro was born in America, was ever made a citizen of either of the States of the United States before the adoption of this Constitution. The whole material out of which citizens were made previous to the adoption of the present Constitution was from the European nationalities, from the Caucasian race, if I may use the term. I deny that a single citizen was ever made by one of the States out of the negro race. I deny that a single citizen was ever made by one of the States out of the Mongolian race. I controvert that a single citizen was ever made by one of the States out of the Chinese race, out of the Hindoos, or out of any other race of people but the Caucasian race of Europe.

I come, then, to this position: that whenever the States, after the Declaration of Independence and before the present Constitution was adopted, legislated in relation to citizenship or acted in their governments in relation to citizenship, the subject of that legislation or that action was the Caucasian race of Europe; that none of the inferior races of any kind were intended to be embraced or were embraced by this work of government in manufacturing citizens. I am not disposed to labor that proposition strenuously and elaborately, but I lay it down as a proposition that cannot be refuted, that whenever the different States of the Union were making citizens before the adoption of the present Constitution, all their purposes, all their intentions, and all their powers upon that subject were simply to make foreigners of the European family of nations citizens of the United States.

Now, sir, what is the rule of construction of our Constitution as laid down so frequently by the Supreme Court, and of the construction of every constitution and every instrument of writing? It is this, and the honorable Senator from Illinois will not controvert it: that the parties who frame an instrument give their own meaning, according to their understanding of the terms and language which they use, to that instrument, and that, therefore, in construing the Constitution of the United States, all we have to do is to read the language, and to ascertain from contemporaneous expositions, as well as from the force of the terms themselves, what particular meaning the framers of the Constitution intended their language to import. Whatever meaning they intended to attach to the language of that instrument or to any of its phrases, by that light and by that rule is the Constitution to be construed and interpreted.

I take an example. The Constitution defines treason. What has been the construction of all of our courts in relation to the term "treason?" That the framers of the Constitution used that term precisely in the sense in which it was used in 23 Edward III, and as that term had been expounded by the courts at Westminster. By time and by the modifications of language the ideas and meaning, living and current, of the term "treason" might vary; but in the construction of the Constitution and in the definition of treason there would be no such variation. An enlightened and honest and able judge, called upon to define what treason was to a jury under the Constitution of the United States, would recur back to the meaning of that term as generally understood at the time the Constitution was adopted and as the framers of that Constitution intended it should be understood; and whenever the sense had thus been obtained the matter would be rendered clear and explicit, and the idea which the term imported at that day, and which those who made the Constitution and used this term intended to imply by it, would be accepted as the true construction of the Constitution.

I give one other example: the Constitution interdicts ex post facto laws; it declares that no ex post facto law shall be passed. That is a technical term; it is a term of art; and it has a specific meaning. When that clause of the Constitution is in court for construction, we do not resort to the ordinary acceptance and understanding of the term ex post facto. We hunt for its legal definition at the time the Constitution was adopted, how learned judges and learned lawyers in the profession understood the term, and through all future time, as long as that Constitution is respected, until it is changed in the mode prescribed by the instrument itself, will the meaning, as they understood it and intended to use it, be adopted by the courts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him if he means to assert that negroes were not citizens of any of these colonies before the adoption of the Constitution?

Mr. DAVIS. I will come to that presently.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood him to assert that they were not citizens when the Constitution was adopted in any of the States, and to challenge contradiction.

Mr. DAVIS. I say they were not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator wish any authority to show that they were? If he does, I will state to him that I have before me—

Mr. DAVIS. When I get through you can answer me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the Senator to challenge me to produce any proof on that point, and I thought he would like to have it in his speech. I can assert to him that by a solemn decision of the supreme court of North Carolina they were citizens before the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will get along with my remarks.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think you will get along better by not being exposed in your statements.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator is full of conceit, but I have seen less conceit with a great deal more brains than he has. If the honorable Senator will restrain himself he will have an opportunity after a while. That is not the main point that I am coming to. It is not the main buttress that I am attempting to throw up for the defense of the positions that I take.

I was speaking of the manner in which the Constitution is to be interpreted. I challenged the honorable Senator to deny the principles and canon upon which I proceeded to interpret the Constitution. If he denies them, when he gets up to speak he can maintain his position. I say now—and I made use of that argument to fortify this position—that when the term "naturalization" was introduced into the Federal Constitution, it was introduced with precisely the same meaning and understanding in which it had been understood and executed in the different States. By the old Articles of Confederation Congress had no power to naturalize a foreigner. The old Articles of Confederation had no power to naturalize a foreigner. Each State naturalized foreigners for itself, and the States had various and discrepant systems. In some of the States it required a longer and in other States a shorter term of residence to authorize a foreigner to become a citizen. What was the consequence? The various systems of naturalization by the different States introduced confusion and disorder and inconvenience. It was with a view to prevent these inconveniences, by having a uniform system, that in the Convention of 1787 the whole subject of naturalization was given up to Congress. Each State yielded it for itself; it yielded it to the General Government. It yielded it in two forms only. The first form was as an incident of the treaty-making power. Whenever a foreign country or foreign subjects or citizens were annexed to the United States, citizenship accompanied it as an incident of the treaty-making power. They yielded it in this other form by naturalization. It was to obviate a discrepant and discordant system of naturalization by the various States that this power was vested by the Constitution in the General Government; and in what language was it vested? Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. That is the language. Now, sir, my position is, that anything which does not amount to a uniform rule of naturalization does not fulfill the requirement of the Constitution, and is invalid. Does a little, petty law, local and almost personal in its character, applying simply to the Stockbridge Indians, or any other tribe of Indians, establish a uniform rule of naturalization? Not at all. Does the amendment of the gentleman establish a uniform rule of naturalization? Not at all. The naturalization spoken of here is the admission of a foreigner to the rights of citizenship. That is the subject; and under the provision of the Constitution I will read some authorities presently on that subject. There are but two modes in which a foreigner can be admitted to become a citizen of the United States. One is in case he shall have been an inhabitant of country acquired by the treaty-making power by the United States; and if he does not come up to that rule, the other is that he can only be admitted by a law of Congress establishing a uniform rule of naturalization. I therefore might say to the honorable Senator—but I have a stronger position behind yet—that his amendment not establishing a uniform rule, but being different, discrepant from the uniform rule of naturalization prescribed by the law of Congress, and Congress having only power to establish a uniform rule, his amendment is unconstitutional, because it does not come up to the criterion that is furnished by the Constitution.

But, Mr. President, my main position is that no native-born person of the United States of any race or any color can be admitted a citizen of the United States by Congress under the power conferred in relation to naturalization by the Constitution upon Congress. It is preposterous and absurd to pretend to make you, sir, or any gentleman born in the United States, a citizen of the United States under the power of Congress to pass a uniform rule of naturalization. Why? Because you are not a foreigner. This is the truth about it; it is a historical truth, and it establishes the principle, too, that all the action and operation of the State governments before the Constitution was formed, and the provision of the Constitution itself in relation to naturalization and investing Congress with that whole subject under the authority to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, refers exclusively to foreigners. You being born here might become the subject of this naturalization law and system; but what would be necessary before you could be placed in such a condition? You would have to go to some foreign country and sever your tie of allegiance to the Government of the United States, and assume that tie toward some foreign Government or foreign potentate before you could be the subject of naturalization here.

Now, sir, I will read from one or two authorities on this subject. Let me state the position which I want the learned and able Senator and jurist from Illinois to assail if he can. I lay down the proposition that no man but a foreigner can be admitted a citizen of the United States under our naturalization laws or under any power which Congress has to naturalize. I read first from Story's Commentaries upon the Constitution, sections 1097, 1098, and 1099:

"Sec. 1097. The next clause is, that Congress 'shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.'

"Sec. 1098. The propriety of confiding the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization to the national Government seems not to have occasioned any doubt or controversy in the Convention. For aught that appears on the journals, it was conceded without objection. Under the Confederation, the States possessed the sole authority to exercise the power; and the dissimilarity of the system in different States was generally admitted as a prominent defect, and laid the foundation of many delicate and intricate questions. As the free inhabitants of each State were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the other States, it followed that a single State possessed the power of forcing into every other State, with the enjoyment of every immunity and privilege, any alien whom it might choose to incorporate into its own society, however repugnant such admission might be to their polity, conveniences, and even prejudices."

It seems that the "prejudices" of a people were regarded in that primal and virtuous day that are now so fiercely struck at in this bill and its twin sister.

"In effect every State possessed the power of naturalizing aliens in every other State; a power as mischievous in its nature as it was indiscreet in its actual exercise. In one State, residence for a short time might and did confer the right of citizenship. In others, qualifications of greater importance were required. An alien, therefore, incapacitated for the possession of certain rights by the laws of the latter, might, by a previous residence and naturalization in the former, elude at pleasure all their salutary regulations for self-protection. Thus the laws of a single State were preposterously rendered paramount to the laws of all the others, even within their own jurisdiction. And it has been remarked with equal truth and justice that it was owing to mere casualty that the exercise of this power under the Confederation did not involve the Union in the most serious embarrassments. There is great wisdom, therefore, in confiding to the national Government the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States. It is of the deepest interest to the whole Union to know who are entitled to enjoy the rights of citizens in each State, since they thereby in effect become entitled to the rights of citizens in all the States. If aliens might be admitted"—

Wherever there is a reference to the making of a citizen by naturalization it invariably applies to aliens. It does in all the debates and proceedings of the Convention. It does in every adjudication of every court in America upon the subject of naturalization. It has reference all the time and exclusively to aliens.

"If aliens might be admitted indiscriminately to enjoy all the rights of citizens at the will of a single State, the Union might itself be endangered by an influx of foreigners, hostile to its institutions, ignorant of its powers, and incapable of a due estimate of its privileges."

"Sec. 1099. It follows, from the very nature of the power, that to be useful it must be exclusive."

I read these passages for the purpose of showing that it was the purpose and the only purpose of the framers of the Constitution that this power to make citizens of people who were not born in the country should apply to foreigners and to foreigners alone. Upon that point I will read another authority. I have a good deal of it here with which I shall not trouble the Senate. I have before me the work of Mr. Woolsey on international law, a Connecticut writer of very great learning and ability. I read from his work, page 150, section sixty-six:

"Foreign residents in most Christian countries can sustain, in the course of time, a closer or more distant connection with the body-politic. They can acquire nationality, or in other words become naturalized, or they may remain in the territory as domiciliated strangers."

He says expressly that foreigners (not native-born subjects or citizens) can become naturalized; and then comes this language, to which I ask the attention of the honorable Senator from Maryland:

"Naturalization implies the renunciation of a former nationality, and the fact of entrance into a similar relation toward a new body-politic."

There is the definition, and the whole of it. Naturalization implies the renunciation of a former nationality, and the entering into a new obligation of allegiance to another Power. Why, sir, in all the civil history of naturalization by the States or by the United States the gentleman cannot find an instance, nor a principle, nor a dictum where this change in the relationship of a person toward this Government was ever attempted to be made in relation to any individual whatever, unless that individual owed allegiance to another Government.

I could read from Kent; I could read from the decisions of the various courts, State and Federal, all to the same effect, that the subject upon which alone and exclusively the naturalization process or naturalization laws under the Constitution of the United States can operate, is a foreigner who owes allegiance to another potentate or to another Government. The books are filled with this class of cases. We concede here the right of expatriation. England does not. England has no law that establishes a uniform rule of naturalization. When naturalization takes place in that country it is by special act of Parliament. Although she admits in that form the subjects or citizens of other countries to incorporate themselves with the subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, she does not concede, or at least has not yet formally conceded, the right of any of her subjects to cut the bond between them and her Government.

So it is, Mr. President, wherever you can trace naturalization by Constitution, State or Federal, by laws, State or Federal, because even after the adoption of the present Constitution some of the States still claimed the right to have a concurrent power of naturalization. It was claimed by Pennsylvania and other States, but eventually our courts settled so distinctly and so authoritatively that the power was exclusive, and was intended to be sole and exclusive on the part of the General Government, that the States abandoned it. But wherever you can trace any Constitution, State or Federal, that makes a provision in relation to naturalization, wherever you can trace the enactment of a law in relation to that subject, wherever you can trace the admission of a person to the rights of citizenship, it will be found that those constitutions and those laws and those admissions applied to foreigners and never to native-born persons. It is not necessary to look to lexicographers for the definition of "foreigner." We all know that a foreigner is one who owes allegiance to another Government. Can the negro here, born within the United States, be said to be a foreigner? Does he owe any allegiance to another Government? Is he an alien and a stranger to our country and our laws and our Government? Not at all.

Does the honorable Senator from Illinois mean to assume the position that he declared with so much distinctness and emphasis a day or two ago, that everybody born in the United States is a citizen? What became of your slave negroes that were born in the United States? What became of your free negroes that were born in the United States? Sir, [Mr. Foot in the chair,] your State abolished slavery a great many years ago. I believe that eight of the original States abolished slavery many years ago. The five New England States (Massachusetts having abolished slavery while Maine was a part of that State,) New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania are the eight States to which I allude. They all abolished slavery, and in all of those States doubtless negroes and a good many negroes have been born of negro parents who were free. Does the honorable Senator intend to say that all the posterity of those freed negroes were citizens? A State now has no power to make a citizen. The States did have that power before the Constitution was formed; and just as the process and business of making citizens by naturalization was understood and practiced and intended by the States before the Constitution was formed, just in that sense, and to that extent, and with that scope of power, and no further, was the authority taken from the States and vested in Congress to pass naturalization laws.

Now, sir, to throw myself back upon the principle of construction which I stated at the start, naturalization and citizenship must be understood in the sense and with the same import which were attached to those phrases by the framers of the Constitution; and where we can reach upon any controverted point to a reasonable degree of certainty what they did mean, that meaning we are bound to adopt in a faithful and just construction of the Constitution. What would have been the fate of such a proposition as this in the Convention of 1787? There were then free negroes in most of the States, and there were slaves in all the States; even slaves were held in Massachusetts. Notwithstanding Massachusetts contends that by her constitution of 1776 slavery was abolished, she held slaves many years afterward. But suppose in that Convention the proposition had been made which the honorable Senator now contends for, and it had been proposed to incorporate as one of the provisions of the Constitution that "all children of free negroes born hereafter shall be citizens of the United States," will the honorable Senator say that he believes such a provision as that would have been accepted by the southern men who were in that Convention? Will he say that it would have been practicable or possible to incorporate such a provision as that in the Constitution? Certainly not. When gentlemen concede that such a proposition could not have been incorporated in the Constitution, and that sooner than have accepted it the southern members would have broken up that body, and would have dispersed without making a Government at all, how can they in candor and in truth say that it comes within the scope and operation and meaning of the Constitution, as they who framed it intended it should read and mean and operate, that the children of negroes that were free should be citizens of the United States?

Mr. President, a grave hallucination in this day is to claim all power; and a minor error is that everything which passion, or interest, or party power, or any selfish claims may represent to the judgment or imagination of gentlemen who belong to strong parties, to be necessary or useful for the good and the domination of such parties, is seized upon in defiance of a fair construction of language, in outrage of the plain meaning of the Constitution. That is not the rule by which our Constitution is to be interpreted. It is not the rule by which it is to be administered. On the contrary, if the able, honorable, and clear-headed Senator from Illinois would do himself and his country the justice to place himself in the position of the framers of the Constitution; if he would look all around on the circumstances and connections of that day, on the purposes of those men not only in relation to forming a more perfect Union, but also in relation to securing the blessings of life, liberty, and property to themselves and their posterity forever; if the honorable Senator would construe the Constitution according to the light, the sacred and bright light which such surrounding circumstances would throw upon his intellect, it seems to me that he would at once abandon this abominable bill and would also ask to withdraw its twin sister from the other House that both might be smothered here together upon the altar of the Constitution and of patriotism.

Mr. President, we have had some able lexicographers in this country, and among them was Mr. Noah Webster. In his great and immortal vocabulary will be found the words "naturalize" and "naturalization," and the meaning which he appends to them. How has that great philologist and that great lexicographer reached the meaning of these terms? He has read our history, civil and political; he has seen all the important transactions in which these terms have been used—legislation, Constitution, judicial decision; he has seen the rendition of these terms by the men in America who best understood and who were most competent to give them a clear, a truthful, and a just rendition. After thus preparing himself to give his immortal exposition of the English language, he thus defines these terms:

"Naturalization. The act of investing an alien with the rights and privileges of a native subject or citizen.

"Naturalize. 1. To confer on an alien the rights and privileges of a native subject or citizen; to adopt foreigners into a nation or State, and place them in the condition of natural-born subjects.

"2. To make natural; to render easy and familiar by custom and habit.

"3. To adopt; to make suitable; to acclimate; as to naturalize one to a climate.

"4. To receive or adopt as native; natural or vernacular; to make our own, as to naturalize foreign words; to accustom; to habituate, as to naturalize the vine to a cold climate."

Could anything be more precise than these definitions? If men are searching for truth and principle, do they not find it here, and in the authorities which I have already read? To naturalize is to bring in an exotic. When applied to a man, it is to bring in a foreigner who owes allegiance and obedience to another State or Government; and nobody else is or can be the subject of this provision of our Constitution or of any legislation of Congress under it, and nobody else ever was. Then, how can the honorable Senator apply his amendment to negroes born in the United States? It is impossible.

I will say no more upon the subject of this amendment. When the honorable Senator's bill is before the Senate upon its merits, I intend to hit a lick at the thing generally. I only wish that I could hit it at all in proportion to its enormous demerits.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot.) The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] to the amendment moved by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that amendment of the Senator from Kansas, as now offered, will not be adopted.

Mr. POMEROY. I would inquire whether the amendment has been modified.

Mr. MORRILL. It has been to-day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He withdrew his other amendment and offered one which perhaps the Secretary had better read.

THE SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from Kansas to insert, after the word "power," the words "and Indians holding lands in severalty by allotment;" so as to make the amendment of the Senator from Illinois read:

That all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, and Indians holding lands in severalty by allotment, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think it will do to adopt that amendment as offered. It applies to Indians holding lands by allotment. They may hold them all through the Cherokee nation; they may hold them outside of the organized jurisdiction of the United States in the Indian country. I think it would be unsafe to adopt such an amendment. I have no objection to the amendment in the form in which it was first proposed by the Senator from Kansas, to exclude from naturalization all Indians who owe allegiance to any tribal authority.

I trust, however, the amendment will not be pressed upon this bill. It is intended by the Senator from Kansas to reach a few Indians in that State. I have no objection to their being made citizens, but I trust it will be done in some separate bill, so as not to embarrass this general proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but that the amendment may be too far-reaching, as the Senator suggests. The policy which the Government has adopted for a few years past is to separate some Indians who are competent and civilized from their tribes by giving their allotments in severalty. That policy has been adopted in my State, and that class of Indians should be citizens. I do not care whether they are made citizens by this bill or some other; but it is a very good provision so far as it relates to the Indians with whom I am acquainted. It may, as the Senator suggests, affect Indians in other sections of the country whom it should not reach. I do not know that fact. I would not myself press the amendment on this bill, for I would not embarrass the bill in any way. Still I think the amendment should be adopted in substance somewhere, because as it now is these persons who have their lands in severally and are to all intents and purposes citizens so far as owning property and doing business are concerned, escape all the responsibilities of citizens. Not being citizens under the law, we cannot tax them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Can you not tax their lands?

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir. We have had the question in the courts of our State ever since we have been a State; they have decided some times one way and sometimes the other, and now it has finally gone to the Supreme Court.

Mr. JOHNSON. You have clearly the right to tax property within the State.

Mr. POMEROY. But in the treaties with the Indians it was provided that the Indian lands should not be taxed, and that they should not be incorporated within the limits of any State. All these questions have been argued in the courts, and it has been generally held that the lands cannot be taxed, although the supreme court of my State at its last term did hold that they were subject to taxation. To settle the whole matter, I should be very glad to have a provision of this kind in some bill. If the Senator from Illinois thinks it will embarrass this bill, I would not press it here.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be pressed here.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am requested to say by the Senator from Kansas, who offered this particular amendment, that it would be very agreeable to him to have the Senate postpone action upon it until he could return to the Chamber, he having been called away a short time since on business, expecting to be back in about an hour.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There will be an opportunity to offer it again in the Senate. I hope it will not be adopted now. We are in Committee of the Whole, and if the Senator desires to have a vote upon the question in the Senate, he can offer the amendment again.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we had better vote on it in the Senate when my colleague is in his seat.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator feel authorized to withdraw the amendment? If not, I ask that a vote be taken upon it.

Mr. POMEROY. I would rather have it withdrawn now, and then let us have the vote taken on it in the Senate when it is offered again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No person is competent to withdraw an amendment in the absence of the mover. It must be disposed of by vote of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That vote now determines nothing; the amendment can be offered again in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I am not authorized to withdraw the amendment from what the Senator from Kansas said to me. He did not exactly authorize me to withdraw the amendment, but he expressed the wish that there should be no vote taken upon it in his absence, and if that cannot be avoided except by withdrawing the amendment, I think I am authorized to ask permission of the Senate in his behalf to withdraw it.

Mr. POMEROY. It can be offered again in the Senate even if voted down now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know, but then there is a vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the mover of a proposition cannot authorize another person to act in his stead to withdraw it. That can only be done by the mover himself, or by vote of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We can pass upon the amendment and reject it without a division. That does not prejudice it or affect it at all when offered again in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. It struck me yesterday while we were speaking of the original amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, who is not present, that it accomplished all that he desired, and I think now that it does. If the Senator from Illinois who has charge of this bill has no objection to it, I suggest that we adopt the amendment in the form in which it was presented yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the very thing that I proposed before.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the Senator's objections are perfectly good against the amendment as it now stands, though I differ from him in his construction of the amendment as presented yesterday. I think that when an Indian withdraws from the tribal authority, according to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as offered yesterday, and purchases land, and lives separate and free from the tribal authority, he would become a citizen although he may have grown to the years of manhood under tribal authority. I think the amendment will accomplish that purpose, and if the Senator from Maryland has authority to act in the premises, I suggest that he withdraw the amendment as it now stands and then offer it in the other form, or is it now in order to move it in that form?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. After it shall have been reported to the Senate it will be open to further amendment, and this proposition may be again moved.

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment itself as it now stands is an amendment to an amendment, and therefore a further amendment is not now in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. We can vote down the amendment to the amendment, and then adopt the other amendment to which I have referred, and I suggest that that course be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment moved by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. POMEROY. I move now to amend the amendment by inserting the same language which was proposed by my colleague yesterday. I move to insert the words "tribal authority" after the word "Power."

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will not accomplish the purpose, as I think. These persons who hold lands in Kansas went there long subsequent to their birth, as I suppose, and they were born subject to tribal authority. As I understand the amendment, if adopted in the shape in which it is now proposed, no Indians that were born subject to tribal authority, no matter what may be their present condition, will be made citizens. If the word "now" were inserted before the word "subject," perhaps it would answer the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As this is an amendment to an amendment, it is not open to a third proposition of amendment. The question must be taken upon the words as moved by the mover.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think that when a person who is not a citizen becomes a citizen of the United States there is an obligation on each side. When a foreigner becomes a citizen we have been in the habit of requiring his assent and application to the assumption of the responsibilities of a citizen. Now, the intention obviously is to extend the list of citizens further, without asking the assent of the persons over whom you propose to extend these responsibilities. I do not think that is exactly proper legislation. In the case of foreigners we require them to apply to the courts, and declare on oath their willingness and desire to become citizens. I am not willing to vote to impose the duties of citizenship upon these persons without their consent. Here is a provision that Indians shall become citizens of the United States without their consent or the consent of those exercising authority over them. I cannot consent to impose citizenship and its liabilities and responsibilities upon a people without their assent.

Mr. POMEROY. The argument of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] applies with equal force to the whole bill. He objects to conferring citizenship upon the Indian because the Indian has not consented to it. That argument will apply with equal force to the whole bill. It proposes to make citizens of the colored people of this country. It is an act of legislation in regard to which they have not been consulted. If the objection applies with any force against the Indian it does against the negro, and all the provisions of the bill relating to him. But, sir, I apprehend that the bill will be found to accomplish its purpose in reference both to the negro and the Indian. There is no reason why the two should be separated, so far as their relation to the Government is concerned, except in regard to such Indians as have tribal relations, and are responsible and amenable to a government of their own.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to suggest that under the amendment proposed in reference to Indians, the Indians under the control of the United States upon the public reservation which are maintained by the United States for their care and support would thus be made citizens of the United States. They certainly would under the amendment as it now stands, with the further amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas; and certainly that cannot be contemplated. We have in the State of California public reservations upon which the Indians are gathered in considerable numbers. They have no capacity for citizenship and there would be no propriety in extending citizenship to them, but it would be a great public evil and wrong. They are entirely under the control and disposition of the United States and its officers; they are not under the direction of any tribal authority whatever. They are not excepted by the amendment, and would become citizens if they were born in the United States. They must be excepted also, for that portion of them that live in California, commonly known as Digger Indians—the term applied to describe their tribe—is perhaps the lowest class known of Indians, and utterly and totally unfit to become citizens, apart from their being taken care of by the Government. The Senator from Kansas will perceive on the rereading of the amendment that they would be made citizens.

Mr. POMEROY. I was not aware that there were any Indians on reservations that had no tribal authority or no tribal organization.

Mr. CONNESS. There are.

Mr. POMEROY. Those that I am acquainted with have always had an organization of their own. If they have no organization I cannot understand what officers of the United States are over them. We send Indian agents to the tribes, but always where they have an organization. I have never known any officers of the United States to have control over Indians without an organization.

Mr. CONNESS. The Superintendent of Indian Affairs and his agents and employes have control of them. These Indians are brought in and placed upon reservations. They are cut off from all connection with their tribes. The tribes are not allowed to have any connection whatever with them. They are in all respects subject to the authority of the agents of the Government.

Mr. POMEROY. Have they no chiefs, no bands?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; there is no such thing known.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know anything about that case.

Mr. CONNESS. They have no competency for citizenship.

Mr. RAMSEY. The people of Minnesota, recognizing the remote possibility of an Indian being qualified for citizenship, have made provision by their constitution that Indians having acquired the habits of white men, derisively said to be "the wearing of breeches and drinking whisky," may be admitted by the courts to citizenship. I am not aware, however, that there is any one instance of the exercise of this power by our judiciary. This matter of tribal government is a very loose and ill-defined thing, and any law to be practical should be more definite.

Then, again, Mr. President, there have been large numbers of roving Indians on our frontier, and they were the most mischievous of the race, that were outlaws, refugees from all tribal authority, and recognized no such authority. Under this amendment of the Senator from Illinois, if it become law, these most obnoxious of all Indians would be admitted to the inestimable privilege of citizenship, a thing, of course, not desired by any member of the Senate, and most odious to the people of the frontier States and Territories.

Mr. President, should this amendment to the amendment be rejected, I will then, to meet this difficulty, propose to add these words, "or Indians not admitted to citizenship by the laws of any of the States." My object is to exclude all Indians from citizenship except such as the laws of any one of the States elevate to such a status.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should be very glad to accommodate our friends who feel some interest in regard to the Indians located in their respective States, but the Senate will perceive how difficult it is to accommodate the different interests that are represented here. The Senator from Kansas desires that the Indians who have so far separated from their tribes as to have lands set apart to them severally shall be declared citizens of the United States. The Senator from California desires that the Indians in his State who are placed upon reservations and are not under tribal authority, as I understand him, should not be citizens. He thinks that they have not so far withdrawn from their wild relation, being fugitives or refugees, as they are described by the Senator from Minnesota, that they can properly be declared citizens.

Now, I should be very glad if our friends would not embarrass this general bill with provisions in regard to this particular class of persons. Let them be legislated for specially. Of course we cannot declare the wild Indians who do not recognize the Government of the United States at all, who are not subject to our laws, with whom we make treaties, who have their own regulations, whom we do not pretend to interfere with or punish for the commission of crimes one upon the other, to be the subjects of the United States in the sense of being citizens. They must be excepted. The Constitution of the United States excludes them from the enumeration of the population of the United States, when it says that Indians not taxed are to be excluded. It has occurred to me that perhaps an amendment would meet the views of all gentlemen, which used these constitutional words, and said that all persons born in the United States, excluding Indians not taxed, and not subject to any foreign Power, shall be deemed citizens of the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. That will do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But I do not know that that would meet the view of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but that it would. All that we ask is that those who are taxed shall be citizens.

Mr. CONNESS. Then that will meet the views of all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Kansas to the amendment moved by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas at present to withdraw the amendment, and the matter can be considered and acted upon in the Senate. Then we shall undoubtedly be able to adjust the language to suit all parties.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall be very glad not to embarrass the bill at this stage, and I withdraw my amendment to the amendment with the understanding that I shall move it again in the Senate after we have matured the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment being withdrawn, the question recurs on the amendment to the first section of the bill moved by the Senator from Illinois. It will be the right of the Senator from Kansas, understanding or no understanding, to move his amendment in the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will move to insert these words in the amendment pending—I think they will perhaps meet the views of all gentlemen—"excluding Indians not taxed," after the word "power."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator so modify his amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will so modify it that it will read "that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, (excluding Indians not taxed,) are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment, and the question is on it as thus modified.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it competent for the Senator from Illinois to make that a part of his original amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is competent for the Senator from Illinois to modify his own amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should object to it if I had the power to do so. I do not like to see the right of citizenship depend on the question whether a man is taxed or not. I do not know that that has ever been done in any Government. Citizenship is a very high right. It is the right to be considered a member of the political community, and for us to say that Indians or anybody else shall be citizens or not citizens, dependent upon the question whether they pay taxes, is certainly a very objectionable proposition.

I do not intend to discuss this proposed amendment to the bill. I rose mainly to suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he had better leave out those words. This is a bill for a particular purpose, as I understand from him, to accomplish what he thinks is required by the second section of the amendment to the Constitution. That second section certainly does not require that we shall now define citizenship. The discussion thus far has satisfied me that it is a very difficult thing to do so. The framers of the Constitution did not undertake to do it; the legislators of the Government up to this time have not undertaken it; and an examination of the works upon the subject, and of those that treat incidentally of the subject, satisfies me that it is a difficult thing to define citizenship. I do not want to see it cheapened in this country. In times past, to be called an American citizen was a very proud title. Now, if we are going to change it, if we are going to extend it to Indians, who have never been regarded as citizens, I think we should do it in a separate bill where the whole subject can be fully considered. It is not germane to this bill, and I suggest to the Senator that he will avoid trouble himself in the management of his bill and relieve the Senate from embarrassment by leaving it off the bill altogether.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My own opinion is that all these persons born in the United States and under its authority, owing allegiance to the United States, are citizens without any act of Congress. They are native-born citizens. That is my judgment about it; but there is a difference of opinion upon that subject. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] thinks differently, and some of the courts in the southern States have held differently. The recent Attorney General gave it as his opinion that free persons of color were citizens at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and are now. The Senator from Kentucky, who has based his argument and his hour's speech upon the supposition that negroes cannot be citizens because they were not citizens when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, has forgotten the history of the country. By the Articles of Confederation free persons of color were citizens, just as much citizens as white persons. The fourth of the fundamental Articles of the Confederation was as follows:

"The free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States."

That was one of the Articles of Confederation, that the free inhabitants, excepting paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice, should be citizens of the several States; and when that clause was under consideration in the convention which adopted the Articles of Confederation it was moved to insert the word "white;" and this meets the precise question put by the Senator from Kentucky. He wants to know if the southern States would have submitted to have Africans or negroes made citizens. They did submit to it, and there were only two States opposed to it. On the 25th of June, 1778, the Articles of Confederation being under consideration by the Congress, the delegates from South Carolina moved to amend this fourth article by inserting after the word "free" and before the word "inhabitants" the word "white," so that the privileges and immunities of general citizenship would be secured only to white persons. Two States voted for the amendment, eight States voted against it, and the vote of one State was divided.

Now, is there any question or could there be any, that free persons of color were citizens under the Articles of Confederation? How was it in North Carolina? I happen to have before me the report of the decision made in 4 Devereux's and Battle's Reports, in the case of The State vs. Manuel, in which the opinion was delivered by Judge Gaston. He says:

"According to the laws of this State, all human beings within it, who are not slaves, fall within one of two classes. Whatever distinctions may have existed in the Roman laws between citizens and free inhabitants, they are unknown to our institutions. Before our Revolution, all free persons born within the dominions of the King of Great Britain, whatever their color or complexion, were native-born British subjects—those born out of his allegiance were aliens. Slavery did not exist in England, but it did in the British colonies. Slaves were not in legal parlance persons, but property. The moment the incapacity, the disqualification of slavery, was removed, they became persons, and were then either British subjects, or not British subjects, according as they were or were not born within the allegiance of the British king. Upon the Revolution no other change took place in the laws of North Carolina than was consequent on the transition from a colony dependent on a European king to a free and sovereign State. Slaves remained slaves. British subjects in North Carolina became North Carolina freemen. Foreigners, until made members of the State, remained aliens. Slaves manumitted here became freemen; and, therefore, if born within North Carolina are citizens of North Carolina, and all free persons born within the State are born citizens of the State. The constitution extended the elective franchise to every freeman who had arrived at the age of twenty-one, and paid a public tax; and it is a matter of universal notoriety, that under it free persons without regard to color claimed and exercised the franchise, until it was taken from free men of color a few years since by our amended constitution."

This is from the opinion of a court in North Carolina, and that opinion is referred to in subsequent decisions of the courts in North Carolina with approbation. The Senator from Kentucky says if they are already citizens by the Constitution, why do you declare it in a law? We often pass laws to remove doubts, and I should like to remove the doubt even from the mind of the Senator from Kentucky, if that were possible.

But the Senator from Indiana objects that this amendment as now proposed, including Indians not taxed, is an invidious distinction. He does not want to see this idea of property introduced into the law as a requisite for citizenship; he would not recognize property as giving this high privilege of being an American citizen. The Constitution of the United States has used this language in regard to the Indians. The Indians have separate governments of their own. They do not recognize nor are they made subject to the laws of the United States. They make and administer their own laws; they are not counted in our population; they are not represented in our Government; and the Constitution of the United States in determining who shall be represented says:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

Does the Senator from Indiana want the wild, roaming Indians not taxed, not subject to our authority, to be citizens of the United States—persons that are not to be counted in our Government? If he does not, let him not object to this amendment that brings in even the Indian when he shall have cast off his wild habits and submitted to the laws of organized society and become a citizen. I can see no objection to the amendment in its present form. I hope it may be adopted for the purpose of removing doubts, not because I suppose it necessary, for I believe that the native-born person of African descent now who is a freeman in this land is as much a citizen as any of us.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no desire that the savage Indian shall be declared a citizen of the United States. I have no desire that any Indian shall be declared a citizen of the United States. I do not think he is now; and I do not think we ought to make him such. I think he is not, because two of the most learned of our Attorney Generals have so decided when the question was submitted to them, that he is not a citizen of the United States. The clause of the Constitution to which the Senator has referred has nothing to do with the question of citizenship, and therefore he cannot use it in reply. It is on a question of taxation and representation, what the basis of each shall be. My objection is to his proposition of making property a test of citizenship. If it is right in regard to the Indian, why is it not right in regard to the African, and then why not right in regard to the white man? What the Senator wants, as I understand, is civilization on the part of the Indian, and I presume he wishes to make the holding of property the test of intelligence on the part of the Indian. If he be a tax-payer, he is presumed to be sufficiently intelligent to be a citizen of the United States. I do not admit the test; therefore I object to the proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a word or two in reference to what the Senator from Illinois has said. I assumed that the gentleman's proposition of amendment could not be entertained. First, I denied the proposition which he made in his speech of the day before yesterday that a negro was a citizen. I assumed the other proposition that whether a negro was a citizen or not, he was not a foreigner; and not being a foreigner he cannot be naturalized by any act of Congress, special or general; that nobody but a foreigner can be naturalized.

Now, by way of repelling the first position, the honorable Senator introduces a decision of one of the North Carolina courts that a negro was a citizen in North Carolina. When was he made a citizen in North Carolina if he was a citizen there? It was before the Constitution was formed. He had the right to vote in North Carolina. Will the honorable Senator say that if that negro, having the right to vote in North Carolina, had gone over to Virginia, or South Carolina, or Georgia, he would have been a citizen there and entitled to the privileges of citizenship? He might have claimed them, but they never would have been accorded to him.

The mere right to vote does not amount to citizenship. Citizenship, under the Constitution, is something different from what it was before the Constitution was formed. Before the Constitution was formed every State made its own citizens; every State coined its own money. Since the formation of the Constitution, there is but one power to coin money, there is but one power to make citizens, and that is the Government of the United States. The State of Illinois admitted unnaturalized foreigners who had been resident in that State six months to vote. Did the fact that Illinois permitted an unnaturalized foreigner who had been resident there six months to take part in her government make him a citizen of the United States? Not at all.

My position is that this is a white man's Government. It was made so at the beginning. The charters that were granted by the different sovereigns of England to the various colonies were granted to white men and included nobody but white men. They did not include Indians.

They did not include negroes. When the troubles with the mother country commenced in 1764, and culminated in revolution and a Declaration of Independence in 1776, all of that protracted and important transaction was by white men, and by white men alone. The negro had nothing to do with it, no more than the Indian; he was no party to it. It was not for his grievances that that struggle was made; it was not to reform his wrongs that that bloody war was waged; it was not to establish a Government in which he was to be a party or a power that the Declaration of Independence was enunciated to the world and the old Articles of Confederation formed; it was not to make him a party to our present Government that the Constitution was formed. He was no party in the Convention; he was not represented in the Convention which framed the present Constitution. It is a white man's Government. I say that the negro is not a citizen. He may be made a citizen by power, but it will be in disregard, I think, of principle. I deny that this is a Government of amalgamation. I deny that the governing population, the population that is clothed with political power and political sovereignty, is the result of miscegenation. It is a white population, and not a negro population or an Indian or a mixed population. That is the truth of history. It is the truth of principle. Power and numbers may trample that truth under foot and disregard it; but if Marshall and Story and Washington and their compeers upon the supreme bench were here to rule this principle, they would rule it as our fathers understood it, in my judgment.

I still then reiterate the position that the negro is not a citizen here according to the essential fundamental principles of our system; but whether he be a citizen or not, he is not a foreigner, and no man, white or black or red or mixed, can be made a citizen by naturalization unless he is a foreigner. You cannot make a citizen in that way of a native. You cannot make a citizen of anybody that is not a foreigner. You cannot transmute into a citizen any man but one who owes allegiance to a foreign Government or a foreign potentate.

If the honorable gentleman is so confident in his positions and so strongly intrenched and fortified in them as he appears to be, let him bring up and examine a principle, a dictum, where anybody but a foreigner was ever admitted to be naturalized in the States or in the United States. Let him bring up a solitary example where a native of the country, who had never become denationalized by leaving it, and who owed no allegiance and no obedience to a foreign Government or a foreign potentate, was ever admitted by any process whatever to American citizenship.

Mr. CLARK. I wish the Senator from Kentucky would tell us what constitutes a citizen under the Constitution.

Mr. DAVIS. No foreigner is a citizen in the fullest sense of the word at all.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is now telling us who is not a citizen, but my question is what constitutes a citizen?

Mr. DAVIS. I leave that to the exercise of your own ingenuity by to-morrow. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. That is it. Washington is dead; Marshall is dead; Story is dead; I hoped the Senator from Kentucky would have enlightened us. He says a negro is not a citizen, and a negro is not a foreigner and cannot be made a citizen. He says that a person who might be and was a citizen before the Constitution, is not a citizen since the Constitution was adopted. What right was taken away from him by the Constitution that disqualifies him from being a citizen? The free negroes in my State, before the Constitution was adopted, were citizens.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly, because I asked the Senator to define what a citizen was.

Mr. DAVIS. Was a free negro in New Hampshire before the Constitution a citizen of the United States?

Mr. CLARK. He was a citizen of my State.

Mr. DAVIS. That being admitted, was he a citizen of the United States?

Mr. CLARK. He was in my judgment a citizen of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. If he went to Virginia or South Carolina, would he have been entitled to citizenship there?

Mr. CLARK. I think he would; I have not any doubt about it.

Mr. DAVIS. Neither have I any that he would not.

Mr. CLARK. I think he would, because the Constitution has provided that a citizen of one State shall have the rights and privileges of citizens in the several States.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the Senator from Kentucky asks how it was before the Constitution.

Mr. CLARK. He was a citizen before the Constitution made that provision.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was the question put by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CLARK. When the Senator from Kentucky says he was not represented in the Convention that formed the Constitution, he says what was not true in fact.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The State of New Hampshire had or might have had her separate State coin, her separate coined money, before the Constitution was adopted. Is not that true, that she either had or might have had her own coin? I pause for a reply.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, certainly, sir. I did not suppose the Senator was waiting.

Mr. DAVIS. If she had her own coin emitted and circulated before the Constitution was formed, would the adoption of the Constitution have made that coin of the United States? She had her own citizenship according to her own laws; and because she had her own citizenship before the Constitution was adopted, the Constitution of the United States did not on its ratification adopt her citizenship and her citizens as citizenship and citizens of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. I do not propose to discuss the question of coinage; it is the question of citizenship that I am after. Before the Constitution was adopted the free black man in my State was just as much a citizen as the white man; and when delegates were chosen to the Convention which adopted the Constitution he had a right to vote, and undoubtedly did vote, as well as the white man. They formed that Constitution. In that Constitution there is nothing declaring that a negro shall be a citizen of the United States, and there is nothing declaring that a white man shall be. They stand on the same foundation. There is nothing declaring that the black man shall not be a citizen, nothing declaring any distinction between them; and it is a distinction which the Constitution does not recognize when the Senator from Kentucky undertakes to say that it excludes the black man and does not exclude the white man.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator will permit me to explain that I did not say it excluded the black man. I say it ignored the black man; it paid no attention to him; it was made by a different race of beings; it did not comprehend him; he had nothing to do with it any more than the Indian of the forest had, any more than the Chinaman in California had in the formation of the constitution of that State.

Mr. CLARK. I do not admit what the Senator says; I do not admit that it ignored him; that would be the same thing as to deny him citizenship; but I do not assert that the free black man was a part of the people of the United States, and "we, the people," formed that Constitution, and therefore are entitled to the rights of it. I say the free black man is a citizen under the Constitution, because he held that right before, and if the Senator wants to know when he became a citizen of this country I will tell him: he became so when he helped to achieve the independence of the country equally with the white man; and as the Constitution did not exclude him he held his rights under the Constitution. He assisted in my State in electing delegates to that Convention, and so in other States.

I desire to say further, and I will say now, Mr. President, though not exactly germane to this point, that in my State there is not a single disqualification or discrimination between the white man and the black man, and there is not to be found on the statute-book any act making him free, for he never was a slave there. He may, in some cases, have been held in duress; he was always a freeman legally.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator answer me a question?

Mr. CLARK. I will try to do so.

Mr. DAVIS. Have or have not many Africans been bought and sold as slaves in New Hampshire?

Mr. CLARK. I have no doubt they have been bought and sold, not by law, but by violence and wrong; certainly they have. In the course of my practice in the State of New Hampshire I did once find among some old papers a bill of sale of a negro, dated in 1792; and it was the only instance that I ever did find within that State. I have searched the statutes from beginning to end; I have searched the old laws and the constitution, and I can find no law that ever recognized a slave, nor can I find any law that ever set a slave free.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly; as many as the Senator chooses.

Mr. DAVIS. Did you ever find a law declaring a horse to be property?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. I have found it.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not. We have none in our State. It probably exists by usage.

Mr. CLARK. So it exists in my State by custom; but we recognize it as property by statute as well. We never did recognize a negro as property. We always recognized him as a man and as a citizen.

Mr. DAVIS. How did your people sell him?

Mr. CLARK. They sold him very much as a man steals a horse.

Mr. DAVIS. Your countrymen stole him and sold him.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know whose countrymen sold him. I believe my people are like other people, and if they did steal and sell a negro they did a great wrong to the negro. No matter where slavery exists, be it in New Hampshire or Kentucky, it is a violence and a wrong. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order! order! These demonstrations must not be repeated. They are in violation of the order and decorum of the body. If they are repeated, the Chair will feel compelled to order the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear the galleries at once.

Mr. CLARK. I desired, Mr. President, that the Senator should tell me what in his opinion constituted a citizen under the Constitution. Free negroes were citizens before the Constitution, he admits, in my State.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the honorable Senator. We sometimes answer a positive question by declaring what a thing is not. Now the honorable Senator asks me what a citizen is. It is easier to answer what it is not than what it is, and I say that a negro is not a citizen.

Mr. CLARK. Well, Mr. President, that is a lucid definition. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Sufficient for the subject.

Mr. CLARK. That is a begging of the question. I wanted to find why a negro was not a citizen, if the gentleman would tell me. If he would lay down his definition, I wanted to see whether the negro did not comply with it and conform to it, so as to be a citizen; but he insists that he is not a citizen.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer that question if the honorable Senator will permit me. Government is a political partnership. No persons but the partners who formed the partnership are parties to the Government. Here is a Government formed by the white man alone. The negro was excluded from the formation of our political copartnership; he had nothing to do with it; he had nothing to do in its formation.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to ask a question. Is it a close corporation, so that new partners cannot be added?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; it is a close white corporation. You may bring all of Europe, but none of Asia and none of Africa into our partnership.

Mr. CLARK. Let us see, Mr. President, how that may be. Take the gentleman's own ground, that government is a partnership, and those who did not enter into it and take an active part in it cannot be citizens. Is a woman a citizen under our Constitution?

Mr. DAVIS. Not to vote.

Mr. CLARK. I did not ask about voting. The gentleman said a while ago that voting did not constitute citizenship. I want to know if she is a citizen. Can she not sue and be sued, contract and exercise the rights of a citizen?

Mr. DAVIS. So can a free negro.

Mr. CLARK. Then if a free negro can do all that, why is he not a citizen except that the Dred Scott decision says that—

Mr. DAVIS. Because he is no part of the governing power. That is the reason.

Mr. CLARK. I deny that, because in some of the States he is a part of the governing power. The Senator only begs the question; it only comes back to this, that a nigger is a nigger. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. That is the whole of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. That is the whole of the gentleman's logic. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, but for the decision in the Dred Scott case, to which allusion has been made, perhaps the question would be free from all difficulty; but, as the Senate are already informed, the decision in that case was that, because of the particular condition of the African, neither he nor any of his descendants were citizens. The Senate will find, by referring to that decision, that the court put it entirely upon the ground that the Africans were imported into the United States as slaves, and bought and sold as property, and according to the view that the court took all their descendants partook of that condition; that is to say, they inherited the disqualification of the ancestor. The sins of the ancestor, if they could be called sins, were visited upon the children. They applied that principle by saying that the disqualification of the ancestor because of his condition was to be visited upon the children. It is very obvious upon the reading of that opinion that the court would have come to a different conclusion, provided the Africans had immigrated to the United States as immigrants, instead of coming here as property. If they had come as men and had not been brought in as chattels, then they would have been citizens of the United States. It is also evident that if the Supreme Court had taken the view taken by the honorable member who has just addressed the Senate, [Mr. CLARK,] that there were in the States Africans or descendants of Africans at the time of the adoption of the Constitution who were citizens of the States in which they might be, they would have been citizens of the United States. That is obvious, as I think, from a paragraph in the opinion to which I invite the attention of the Senate, which will be found in 19 Howard, page 406:

The court say, after stating the case:

"The question then arises, whether the provisions of the Constitution, in relation to the personal rights and privileges to which the citizen of a State should be entitled, embraced the negro African race at that time in this country, or who might afterward be imported, who had then or should afterward be made free in any State; and to put it in the power of a single State to make him a citizen of the United States, and endue him with the full rights of citizenship in every other State without their consent."

The court put the question and say:

"The court think the affirmative of these propositions cannot be maintained."

And then follows the passage to which I wish to make particular reference:

"It is true that every person,"—

Without reference to color, black or white—

"It is true that every person, and every class and description of persons, who were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution recognized as citizens in the several States became also citizens of this new political body, but none other; it was formed by them, and for them and their posterity, but for no one else."

Then the court, after entering into a historical examination of the fact whether these people were recognized as citizens of the several States, and coming to the conclusion that they were not so recognized, came to the consequent result that, not being citizens of the States according to the view taken by the court, they were not under the Constitution made citizens of the United States. But if the court had taken the view taken by the honorable member from New Hampshire, that there were in the State of New Hampshire Africans who were citizens of the State, recognized as citizens of the State, participating in the political government of the State, and therefore participating in the election of members of the Convention, and participating in the question whether the Constitution was to be adopted or not, they would have come to the conclusion that they were citizens. The error, therefore, that the court have committed, if they have committed an error at all, a question that I do not propose now to discuss, is not in the principle maintained by the honorable member from New Hampshire but in the historical fact, were or were not negroes in the States of the United States citizens of such States, all or any one, at the time the Constitution was adopted. If the court, to repeat, had come to the conclusion that they were such citizens, then according to their own view it would have followed that they became under the Constitution citizens of the United States, it being true, to repeat the language of the court—

"That every person and every class and description of persons who were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution recognized as citizens in the several States became also citizens of the United States."

But the Supreme Court have decided that negroes are not citizens, and the decision stands before us. Whether it will be recognized hereafter when the question arises in that tribunal at any subsequent time is a matter that I do not propose now to inquire into: there it is, and we have a right to suppose that it may control subsequent decisions; and if it does control subsequent decisions, the result will be that this law will not be operative because the court came to the conclusion that no African who was brought into the country as a slave and sold as a slave was himself, or any of his descendants, a citizen of the United States within the meaning of that term as found in the Constitution of the United States.

But now suppose that those who take a view different from that taken by the Supreme Court take the proper view, that they may be made citizens notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States; let me for a moment address myself to the objection stated by the honorable member from Kentucky. I understand the honorable member as saying that, under the Constitution of the United States, no person can be made a citizen of the United States by legislation except under that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the authority to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. That is his proposition. Now, where does that lead us? See the condition in which we should be placed if that proposition is right.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator does not apprehend me exactly as I intended to express myself. I mean that no person can be naturalized as a citizen of the United States unless that person be a foreigner.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand to have been the proposition of the honorable member, and now I concede it under that clause. I admit that the honorable member is right in saying that that clause was intended to apply only to foreigners who might come to the United States and desire to take upon themselves the character of citizens. Under your naturalization laws, therefore, passed in pursuance of that authority, there is no power to make citizens of the United States under that clause other than those who are foreigners, and subject, therefore, to the Government from which they come. I have no doubt that is true; but does it follow from that that these negroes cannot be made citizens? That would be an extraordinary condition for the country to be in. Here are four million negroes. They are not foreigners, because they were born in the United States. They have no foreign allegiance to renounce, because they owed no foreign allegiance. Their allegiance, whatever it was, was an allegiance to the Government of the United States alone. They cannot come, therefore, under the naturalizing clause; they cannot come, of course, under the statutes passed in pursuance of the power conferred upon Congress by that clause; but does it follow from that that you cannot make them citizens; that the Congress of the United States, vested with the whole legislative power belonging to the Government, having within the limits of the United States four million people anxious to become citizens, and when you are anxious to make them citizens, have no power to make them citizens? It seems to me that to state the question is to answer it.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS. I admitted in the commencement of my remarks that there were two modes of making citizens of foreigners under the Constitution of the United States. The first was by a uniform rule of naturalization to be prescribed by Congress; the second was that where a treaty was negotiated between the United States and a foreign Government by which we acquired territory that contained inhabitants, those inhabitants, by necessary implication, were admitted to citizenship. Now, I put this question in the form of a principle to the Senator: when there are two modes expressed in the Constitution by which this thing may be done, one by express provision and the other by necessary implication, does, or does not, the enumeration of these two modes exclude all other modes?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, so far as the particular persons who would be embraced by the particular modes are involved. But suppose there had been no power given in the Constitution to Congress to naturalize.

Mr. DAVIS. Then we should have had no power to naturalize.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would be a Government of an extraordinary kind.

Mr. DAVIS. No power having been given by the Constitution to the General Government to naturalize a negro, a negro cannot be naturalized.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not speaking of the negro; I am speaking of anybody.

Mr. DAVIS. I answered your proposition and I put you mine. I deny the power in the case you state.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why is there not a power given to naturalize the negro? Suppose a negro came from Africa now, could he not be naturalized?

Mr. DAVIS. I say not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why not? Only because the term "white" is contained in our naturalization laws. But I am speaking of the clause of the Constitution in reference to naturalization. The constitutional clause does not use the term "white." Congress might pass a naturalization act that would embrace the negro immigrant as well as the white immigrant. There can be no doubt about that. Then it is not because of their color that the fundamental objection supposed to exist in the mind of the honorable Senator from Kentucky applies.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to explain?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS. This is a Government and a political organization by white people. It is a principle of that Government and that organization before and below the Constitution, that nobody but white people are or can be parties to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think that is an answer to my question. But let me ask the honorable Senator why it was that Congress, when it passed the naturalization act, put in the word "white," and what would have been the effect of the law if that word "white" had not been inserted? Suppose they had provided for the naturalization of all foreigners, would not the black men have been included?

Mr. DAVIS. I say not.

Mr. JOHNSON. So far as the Constitution is concerned, why not? The honorable member reads the Constitution as if it said that none but white men should become citizens of the United States; but it says no such thing, and never intended, in my judgment, to say any such thing. If it had designed to exclude from all participation in the rights of citizenship certain men on account of color, and to have confined, at all times thereafter, citizenship to the white race, it is but fair to presume, looking to the character of the men who framed the Constitution, that they would have put that object beyond all possible doubt; they would have said that no man should be a citizen of the United States except a white man, or rather would have negatived the right of the negro to become a citizen by saying that Congress might pass uniform rules upon the subject of the naturalization of white immigrants and nobody else; but that they did not do. They left it to Congress. Congress, in the exercise of their discretion, have thought proper to insert the term "white" in the naturalization act; but they may strike it out, and if it should be stricken out, I do not think any lawyer, except my friend from Kentucky, would deny that a black man could be naturalized, and by naturalization become a citizen of the United States.

But to go back to the point from which the questions of my honorable friend from Kentucky caused me to digress, we have now within the United States four million colored people, the descendants of Africans, whose ancestors were brought into the United States as chattels. It was because of that condition that they were considered as not entitled to the rights of citizenship. We have put an end to that condition. We have said that at all times hereafter men of any color that nature may think proper to impress upon the human frame, shall, if within the United States, be free, and not property. Then we have four million colored people who are now as free as we are; and the only question is, whether, being free, they cannot be clothed with the rights of citizenship. The honorable member from Kentucky says no, because the naturalization clause does not include them. I have attempted to answer that. He says no, because the act passed in pursuance of that clause does not include them. I have answered that by saying that that act in that particular may be changed.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the Government of the United States any power that is not conferred upon it by the Constitution?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly not.

Mr. DAVIS. Where is the power in the Constitution, or the provision in the Constitution, that gives the right to the Government of the United States to make a citizen of a native-born negro?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that there is any particular clause that says the child of a native-born negro is to be a citizen, but it would be an extraordinary thing if under the judiciary clause it were not in the power of Congress to authorize a native-born negro, to use the language of my friend from Kentucky, to sue.

Mr. DAVIS. I reckon the language is good.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not saying it is not good. I used it because I was sure it was good, as you used it. I would not have used it except upon your authority. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. You are getting modest.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, Mr. President, if we can, by legislation, authorize the negro to sue, we are authorized to go one step at least toward making him a citizen. If we can authorize him to contract we take another step. If we authorize him to testify we take another step; and so to go on by assuming that we authorize him to do every other act that a white man can do, short of the right of voting, what is there in the Constitution which denies us the power to stop when we come to the exercise of that right? I can find nothing in the Constitution which leads to that result. If I am right in the opinion which I entertain, that we can authorize them to sue, authorize them to contract, authorize them to do everything short of voting, it is not because there is anything in the Constitution of the United States that confers the authority to give to a negro the right to contract, but it is because it is a necessary, incidental function of a Government that it should have authority to provide that the rights of everybody within its limits shall be protected, and protected alike. It would have been a disgrace to the members of the Convention, in my judgment, if they had looked to the condition of things which now exists; or, without looking to that condition of things, if they had looked to the contingency sure to happen, and which was rapidly occurring at the time when the question became a matter of political agitation, that slavery would sooner or later be abolished by State legislation or State action, and had denied to the Congress of the United States the authority to pass laws for the protection of all the rights incident to the condition of a free man.

I rose, Mr. President, with no view except to state the particular observations that I have stated, and will therefore say nothing further.

Mr. DAVIS. I differ toto celo from the honorable Senator from Maryland upon this proposition. My opinion is that the Constitution of the United States never intended to place free negroes or slave negroes under the jurisdiction of the General Government at all; that the whole subject of free negroes and of slave negroes is left by the Federal Constitution, and was intended to be left by the Constitution, under the jurisdiction and exclusive control of the several States.

Mr. STEWART. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. Have we not a provision which is now a part of the Constitution, which expressly provides that we may legislate on this subject?

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator wants my opinion, I say that that provision is revolutionary. Have Congress and the Legislatures of the States the right to change our form of Government? Have they a right to establish a monarchy? Have they a right to establish a Presidency for life? Have they a right to establish a Senate for lifetime, or a Senate that would transmit its honors and its offices to their posterity? Sir, the power to change the Constitution is a power simply to amend; it is not a power to revolutionize; it is not a power to subvert; it is not a power to change our form of Government. Notwithstanding the high authority of the Senator from Maryland, and also of the Senator from Nevada, my position is—I may be overruled and expect to be overruled in it, but still it is my opinion—that under the power simply to amend the Constitution of the United States there is no power to revolutionize it, to subvert it, or to change it from a republic to a monarchy, and these acts cannot be effected by any power except the power of revolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to make some observations upon this bill. I do not know whether it is the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to bring it to a vote to-night—

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will give way, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 31, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report the following additional rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Add at the end of the rules:

RULE.—The Hall of the House shall not be used for any other purpose than the legislative business of the House, nor shall the Speaker entertain any proposition to use it for any other purpose, or for the suspension of this rule: Provided, That this shall not interfere with the performance of divine service therein under the direction of the Speaker, or with the use of the same for caucus meetings of the members, or upon occasions where the House may, by resolution, agree to take part in any ceremonies to be observed therein.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I will make a brief statement in regard to this matter. The House will recollect that the instructions to the Committee on Rules were positive to report a rule to prevent hereafter the use of this Hall for any other purpose than the legitimate business of legislation; and we have so reported, with the proviso read by the Clerk, that it shall not interfere with the use, under the Speaker's direction, of the Hall for divine service, or on the occasions of the ceremonies in honor of the late President, Mr. Lincoln, and touching the demise of our recent associate, Hon. Henry Winter Davis. With that proviso, I think that the House will agree unanimously to the rule we have submitted.

I will state further, sir, that I think the attention of the House has not been sufficiently called to this subject. We have found, on making inquiries of the Doorkeeper, some curious facts in reference to the absolute expenses of the Hall for one evening. The expense for gas, as near as it can be figured out, every evening we grant the use of this Hall, is $150, being at the rate of twenty-five dollars an hour, and the Hall having to be lighted up at six o'clock, and the gas generally not being turned off until twelve o'clock. Then there is the additional expense of twenty-five dollars for heating the Hall. Besides, the wear and tear of the furniture and the injury of the carpets are more in one evening, when the Hall is loaned, than in one week when the Hall is used for legitimate legislative purposes. So we are told by the Doorkeeper; and furthermore that there has not been a single meeting that the desk of some member has not been broken open and rifled despite the watchfulness of the officers of the House.

I think it right and proper we should put an end to this matter. It is a stringent rule, and a stringent rule is necessary. Frequently these meetings are called for benevolent purposes, and members do not feel disposed to oppose them.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me inquire whether the rule makes an exception of the use of this Hall for the contemplated services to the memory of the late President.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman had heard the proviso read, and had heard my remarks, that would have been fully explained. We have a proviso for that very purpose, and all such purposes.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to know whether the resolution is to operate to repeal the grants already made.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Not at all. It repeals nothing. The permissions that have been granted, of course, hold good. This is only for the future. I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest whether we should not except the use of the House for the 12th and 22d of February.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is provided for in the proviso.

Mr. STEVENS. The House has not yet taken any action in regard to the 22d of February.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The proviso applies to precisely such cases as the gentleman refers to. I ask that the whole rule may be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the understanding of the Committee on Rules would be, that as the obsequies of the late Henry Winter Davis were arranged by a meeting of members of the House called in the Capitol, the use of the Hall would not be excluded by this rule as it stands. Where the House participates in any service the Hall is not to be prohibited by this rule. The Chair will also state that the House has granted its consent by yeas and nays for the use of the Hall by the Christian Commission on their anniversary, so that that would be excepted, and they would have a right to hold their meeting on Sunday, the 11th of February. And so in regard to the funeral obsequies of the late President, as that has been arranged by the joint action of both Houses. This has been discussed in the Committee on Rules.

Mr. STEVENS. May I say this? That although the arrangement has been made by members of the House in regard to the funeral obsequies of the late Henry Winter Davis, it was not by action of the House, but by members outside.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House now, that the use of the Hall should be granted for that purpose before the rule shall be adopted.

Mr. HILL. I would ask whether the proviso does not embrace in spirit that particular occasion. Is it not the intention of the resolution to embrace it?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think the intention is express and clear; but to avoid all doubt I ask the unanimous consent that the Hall be granted for the funeral obsequies of the late Henry Winter Davis.

The SPEAKER. That is out of order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the rule be read again.

The Clerk read the rule again.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the rule was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the rule was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE ACT.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to declare the meaning of certain parts of the internal revenue act, approved June 30, 1864, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

COMMUTATION OF RATIONS.

Mr. KETCHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the payment of commutations of rations to all prisoners of war for the period of their confinement, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

THE LATE ARSENAL EXPLOSION.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, asked leave to report a joint resolution for the relief of the sufferers by the late explosion of the United States arsenal in the District of Columbia, and asked its consideration at the present time.

Mr. DAVIS objected.

TERRITORY OF MONTANA.

Mr. McLEAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana," approved May 26, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a bill to regulate the fees of officers in the United States courts in the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CONKLING called for the regular order of business.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask my colleague to allow me to present joint resolutions of the State of New York for reference.

Mr. CONKLING. I think we had better have the regular order. If I give way to my colleague I shall have to yield to others.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Commerce.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill to further secure to American citizens certain privileges under the treaty of Washington.

The bill provides that the produce of the forests of the State of Maine upon the St. John river and its tributaries, owned by American citizens and sawed and hewed in the Province of New Brunswick by American citizens, the same being unmanufactured in whole or in part, which is now admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty, shall continue to be so admitted under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time prescribe. The bill is to take effect from and after March 17, 1866.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will explain in one word the object of this bill. Lumber which is cut on American soil cannot be got to market except by coming down the St. John river and touching in the Province. The object of this bill is to prohibit the collection of duties on such lumber in our own ports. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the subject has been fully considered by the Committee on Commerce. I believe there is no objection to it from any source.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume the bill is all right; but I should like the gentleman to allow time for the Committee of Ways and Means to examine the subject.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentlemen from Maine are very much interested in this bill. If it involves a question of which the Committee of Ways and Means has jurisdiction, I do not wish to press it.

Mr. MORRILL. I will not make any objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE FISHING BOUNTIES.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill to repeal the fishing bounties, with a proviso. Long looked for come at last.

The bill was read. It repeals all laws and parts of laws allowing fishing bounties.

The committee reported the following proviso:

Provided, That from and after the 15th day of February, 1866, vessels licensed to engage in the fisheries may take on board imported salt in bond, to be used in curing fish, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; and upon proof that said salt has been used in curing fish the duties on the same shall be remitted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is an absolute repeal of the fishing bounties, with a proviso that fishermen may purchase their salt in bond free of duty.

Mr. BROOKS. I believe that this is a very good bill as far as it goes; but so far as the shipping interests of the country is concerned, would it not be fair to extend the drawback to cordage, iron, and things of that sort?

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will not ask action of the House on this bill at this time. The Committee of Ways and Means would desire to consider this bill in connection with other subjects.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will withdraw the bill for the present.

MARINE HOSPITALS AND REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back House bill No. 184, to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and of revenue cutters.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to lease or sell at public auction, to the highest and best bidder, for cash, after due notice in the public newspapers, such marine hospitals and lands appertaining thereto as he may deem advisable; and it empowers him to make, execute, and deliver all needful conveyances to the lessees and purchasers thereof respectively, and appropriate the proceeds of said leases and sales for the marine hospital establishment.

The second section of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell to the highest and best bidder for cash, after due notice, such revenue cutters as he shall find to be ill-adapted to the purposes of the revenue service, and to expend the proceeds of such sales in the purchase or construction of other vessels better suited to the wants of said service.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer the following proviso to the first section of the bill:

Provided, That no one of the marine hospitals shall be exposed to sale or lease where the relief furnished to sick mariners shall show an extent of relief equal to twenty cases per diem on an average for the last preceding four years; or where no other suitable and sufficient hospital accommodation can be procured upon reasonable terms for the comfort and convenience of the patients.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have a communication here to the Secretary of the Treasury, which I ask to have published in the Globe for future reference.

No objection was made.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 22, 1866.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting a copy of my report relative to the marine hospitals visited last year under instructions from the Department.

As my report on my return was oral and not required to be made in writing, a literal compliance with the request of the committee is impracticable; but I will, by reference to my notes, endeavor to present a narrative of my visit of inspection, with the result of my observations.

The marine hospital fund has for many years been insufficient for the support of these entitled to its benefits, and large appropriations have been annually required from Congress to supply the inadequate tax levied on the sailors' wages; and the Secretary of the Treasury has been desirous to devise some plan by which this trust fund might be expended with greater efficiency and frugality.

I was therefore instructed, under date of August 1, 1865, by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury to visit and inspect the marine hospitals of the United States, except those on the Pacific coast, and to report their condition, particularly as to the locality, site, and scope of accommodation; to designate the ports where hospitals could be advantageously discontinued, and the places where hospital relief could be better administered by private contract; to ascertain the number of sick seamen relieved at the respective ports during the past year, with the average cost of each patient, and to present a statement showing the difference of cost between relief administered under private contract and in a hospital proper.

In conformity with these instructions, I set out on the 8th of August to visit, in the order specified, the following hospitals: Chelsea, Massachusetts; Portland, Maine; Burlington, Vermont; Cleveland, Ohio; Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; Detroit, Michigan; Chicago, Illinois; Galena, Illinois; Burlington, Iowa; St. Louis, Missouri; Cincinnati, Ohio; Louisville, Kentucky; Evansville, Indiana; Paducah, Kentucky; Napoleon, Arkansas; Vicksburg, Mississippi; Natchez, Mississippi; McDonough, Louisiana; New Orleans, Louisiana; Mobile, Alabama; Pensacola, Florida; St. Marks, Florida; Charleston, South Carolina; Washington, North Carolina; Ocracoke, North Carolina; and Norfolk, Virginia; in all twenty-seven marine hospitals.

Chelsea, Massachusetts.—This hospital is located at Chelsea, near Boston, on an elevated site, and can accommodate at one time about one hundred and fifty patients. The wards are clean and finely ventilated and the house was in perfect order. The lot on which it is built comprises about ten acres, on which are raised all the vegetables used in the house. During the year ending June 30, 1865, seven hundred and eighty patients had been under treatment in the hospital, two hundred and fifty-six of whom were seamen of the United States Navy, whose expenses were paid by the Navy Department.

There is a large tract of land in Chelsea occupied by the old marine hospital. It comprises about seven acres, embracing about one hundred and fifty thousand square feet of city lots, twenty-five in number. The corporation clerk kindly furnished me with a schedule of these lots, which, at an estimate of twenty-five cents a foot, would produce about thirty-seven thousand dollars. There is, besides these, the lot on which the old hospital stands, now occupied as a public school, containing about forty-four thousand square feet, which, at an estimate of thirty cents a foot, would produce about sixteen thousand dollars. The building is valued, for public sale, at about three thousand dollars. A wharf lot, also included in same property, contains about one hundred thousand square feet, and is valued at about thirty thousand dollars. I respectfully suggest that this property be sold.

The lot on which the marine hospital now in use stands is valued at $300,000. There are not sufficient accommodations at Boston for the number of sailors requiring relief at that port, and I respectfully suggest that the marine hospital at Chelsea be continued and sustained by Government. Some repairs are needed, which may require an expenditure of about three thousand dollars.

Portland, Maine.—This marine hospital is located on high ground surrounded by the flats of the Presumpscott river, comprising about eleven acres. The physician informed me, that these flats exhale no morbid atmosphere, and that the patients are never attacked by fevers caused by malaria. The hospital can accommodate about sixty patients. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, eighty-three sick sailors were admitted to the hospital. The past year, however, is no fair criterion of the usual number of patients. The piracies during the late rebellion discouraged commerce, and the number of sailors was much less than in former years. All the wards of the hospital will be needed hereafter. There is no private hospital at Portland, and were this hospital discontinued, there would be no refuge to sick sailors but the almshouse. The interests of commerce, therefore, require the continuance of this marine hospital by the Government. It is kept in fine order.

Burlington, Vermont.—This marine hospital occupies a lot ten acres in extent, about two miles south of the city. It is well built, but it has never been regularly organized. It is under charge of the collector of the port. During the late rebellion it was transferred to the War Department for use as a military hospital. The building is in good repair, and has been since restored to the Treasury with substantial frame buildings, about two thousand feet in extent, erected by the War Department. During the fiscal year only fourteen sick sailors were admitted to the hospital. The building is a mere expense to the Government, and I respectfully suggest that it be sold.

Cleveland, Ohio.—This marine hospital is built within the corporation limits, on a lot containing about eight acres; and its site is about eighty feet above the lake. It is very much out of repair, and requires considerable outlay to render it a comfortable habitation. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, two hundred and thirty patients were admitted, at an expense of $9,521. A large hospital is in process of erection at that port, with ample capacity for marines; and it is respectfully suggested that the marine hospital could be advantageously discontinued, and the property sold.

Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.—This marine hospital is located about three miles west of the city on a lot containing ten acres. It can accommodate about one hundred and fifty patients. During the fiscal year of 1864-65 one hundred and fifteen sick sailors were admitted. The site is low and altogether unsuitable for hospital purposes. Large rolling-mills and furnaces have been erected on the lots contiguous with each side, and the air is filled with smoke and coal dust and noise. Ample private accommodations are available in the city for sick sailors, and a sale of the marine hospital property could be advantageously made. I therefore respectfully suggest that this marine hospital be discontinued and the property sold.

Detroit, Michigan.—This marine hospital is located near the city on a lot containing about four acres. The building can accommodate about one hundred patients. During the fiscal year of 1864-5 two hundred and fifty-nine sick seamen were admitted.

This port is the thoroughfare on the route of the great lake trade, and is readily accessible to almost every sailor employed therein. There are no private hospitals in Detroit affording accommodations sufficient for the sailors. The marine hospital is in admirable order, and the expenditures are frugally made. The building needs considerable repair and improvement. I respectfully suggest that this hospital be continued.

Chicago, Illinois.—This marine hospital having been sold, no particular report need be submitted. The trade of Chicago is very great, and a large number of sailors visit the port. During the fiscal year of 1864-5 five hundred and twenty-seven sick sailors were admitted. There are no private hospitals at Chicago affording accommodation for the number of seamen requiring relief. Some provision must, of course, be made for these beneficiaries after the building now occupied shall have been transferred to the purchaser.

Galena, Illinois.—This marine hospital is located on high ground, containing about thirteen acres, about one mile southwest of the city. There are accommodations for about thirty patients, but there were no patients at all at the time of my visit. The trade at that port is so limited that few applications for hospital relief are made. Months elapse without an admission being sought. I respectfully suggest the discontinuance of this hospital and sale of the property.

Burlington, Iowa.—This marine hospital is located about a mile south of the city on high ground containing about eleven acres. The accommodations are not sufficient for more than ten patients. No application for relief has been made during fiscal year of 1864-5, and it does not seem probable that it would ever be required for a hospital. The lot extends to the waters of the Mississippi, and might produce at public sale $5,000. The building needs repair. I respectfully suggest that this, and this property be sold.

St. Louis, Missouri.—This marine hospital is located near the city on a lot containing about sixty acres. There are accommodations for about fifty patients, but no sick sailors have been admitted during the fiscal year 1864-65, as it was transferred during the rebellion to the War Department, and is now used as a military hospital. There are ample provisions in the private hospitals at St. Louis for the care of sick seamen, and the marine hospital could be advantageously sold. I therefore respectfully suggest the sale thereof.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—This marine hospital is located on the corner of Sixth and Lock streets, in the city of Cincinnati. The building can accommodate about eighty patients. No sick sailor has been admitted during the past fiscal year, as it is now in charge of the War Department, to which it was transferred during the rebellion for a military hospital. The lot is surrounded by factories, and is unfit for a hospital. Ample provision could be made for sick seamen by private hospitals, and I respectfully suggest that this marine hospital property be sold.

Louisville, Kentucky.—This marine hospital is located about two miles from the city on a lot containing about nine acres. It needs an expenditure of at least $20,000 to render it a salubrious habitation. No patient has been admitted during the past fiscal year. The private hospitals in the city are amply sufficient for the care of sick seamen at that port. I therefore respectfully suggest that this marine hospital be sold.

Evansville, Indiana.—This marine hospital is located near the city on a lot about three acres in extent. It might accommodate fifty patients. It is not under regular organization, but a contractor is permitted to occupy the building and receive sick seamen therein at a weekly cost of $6.90. There were eighteen sailors under treatment there at the time of my visit. The building is in bad condition, and the river is gradually but surely encroaching on the foundations. It has been estimated by competent engineers that an expenditure of $50,000 would be necessary to rescue the site. I respectfully suggest that this marine hospital be sold.

Paducah, Kentucky.—This marine hospital was demolished during the rebellion and I was unable to trace its foundations. The lot, about four acres in extent, might, however, be sold, for it is not probable that another marine hospital will ever be erected thereon.

From Paducah I set out for Napoleon and the remaining ports named in my instructions, but when I reached Memphis the surveyor of the customs handed me a telegram and a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recalling me to my desk at Washington. Had I continued my tour of inspection, I could not have returned to the discharge of my current duties under three months—too long a period of absence. I have for several years administered, under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, the affairs of the marine hospitals of the United States, and my experience, together with my observations on my late visit, has led me to the conclusion that the system of relief is itself defective, and its resources altogether inadequate to meet the demands upon the fund.

The sailors of the mercantile marine have, in the first place, no claim on the general Treasury. The workmen in any other branch of business are as much entitled to such relief as marines. But custom has so long conceded this privilege to this class of citizens, that any attempt to inquire into its expediency would be, at least in the present instance, unenforced.

It is, however, within the power of Congress to enlarge the resources of the marine hospital fund.

The act of July 16, 1798, provided that this fund should be formed out of general donations and from a tax of twenty cents a month out of the wages of seamen. At that time, the rate of monthly wages seldom exceeded ten dollars. Since then the expansion of our commercial relations has increased the demand for labor, and the ratio of wages has been so advanced that twenty-five or thirty dollars a month has become the minimum compensation.

The customs' officers have unanimously pressed this point on my attention, and none of them suggested less than a monthly contribution of fifty cents from every seaman. The income from such a tax would be amply sufficient to defray all the expenses of hospital relief.

The discontinuance and sale of unnecessary buildings and property would relieve this trust fund from serious embarrassment. Many of these buildings have been for years unused, and the employment of stewards and watchmen to take care of them has served still more to deplete the fund. The Department has ascertained that relief can be administered more frugally and efficiently by contract with private or municipal institutions. At the sea-ports of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans, sick and disabled seamen are provided for by private contract at a less cost than would attend a regular hospital organization under the Government. These contracts continue in force only for a regular fiscal year; so that an annual renewal to the lowest bidder secures each party from injustice or extortion.

There is no reason why the contract system should not be generally adopted for the administration of hospital relief. At almost every port there are ample facilities for obtaining proper accommodations for sick and disabled seamen at private eleemosynary institutions.

All which is respectfully submitted by your obedient servant,
S. YORKE AT LEE.
Hon. HUGH McCULLOCH, Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ST. LOUIS A PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported adversely upon a bill to establish a port of entry at St. Louis, Missouri; the bill was laid on the table.

PROPELLER F. W. BACKUS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported adversely upon the petition for a change of the name of the propeller F. W. Backus; the petition was laid on the table.

MARITIME LIENS.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back House bill No. 64, to limit the liabilities of ship-owners concerning maritime liens, and for other purposes; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported a bill to regulate further the registering of vessels, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read at length. It provides that no ship or vessel which has been recorded or registered as an American vessel pursuant to law, and which shall have been licensed or otherwise authorized to sail under a foreign flag or the protection of a foreign Government during the existence of the rebellion, shall be deemed or registered as an American vessel, or shall have the rights and privileges of American vessels, except under an act of Congress authorizing such registry.

Mr. ELIOT. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask for the consideration of this bill at this time.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] explain the purpose and object of this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. This bill affects only a single class of vessels. Where vessels which were American have been sold during the rebellion and put under foreign flags by their owners, we all understand that in order that they may again have the benefits of American registry, application must be made to Congress. This bill, therefore, does not affect that class of vessels. But there have been vessels owned by Americans which during the rebellion have procured licenses, or permits in the nature of licenses or sea letters, by which they have enjoyed the protection of foreign flags without having changed their ownership. Remaining upon the record the property of Americans, they have sailed under the flag of foreign nations under licenses obtained from foreign Governments.

Now, the object of this bill is to provide that these vessels, which have thus sought the benefit of foreign flags during the rebellion while still owned by Americans, shall not be deemed hereafter as American vessels, or privileged as such, unless upon a case shown to Congress it should be found proper to authorize the registry of them and the continuance of them as American vessels. That is the sole object and scope of this bill.

There have been cases where disloyal men have availed themselves of the flags and privileges of foreign nations. And it has been thought right by the Committee on Commerce to report this bill and urge its passage, so that after these owners have sought the protection of a foreign nation, if any of them want the protection of their own flag, they shall make a case and show Congress that they have not forfeited their right to ask for such protection.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] if the law as it now stands permits the owners of vessels which have been sold in the way and manner he describes to take an American register without further action by Congress?

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. SPALDING. Then what is the necessity of this bill?

Mr. ELIOT. Because this bill only affects vessels which have not been sold, but which have nevertheless sought the protection of foreign flags.

Mr. SPALDING. Still retaining their American ownership?

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. Is that the only class of vessels to which this bill relates?

Mr. ELIOT. That is all.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment?

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. There seems to be some doubt as to the nature and effect of this bill; and I must confess that I do not quite understand its operation, notwithstanding the explanation of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ELIOT. Perhaps I can explain it in this way: let me suppose that there have been vessels owned, we will say in Baltimore, which have, during the rebellion, continued the property of the old owners, but in order to enjoy a freer right of way upon the ocean, and to avoid the embarrassments to which vessels sailing under the American flag were subjected by reason of the depredations of the rovers upon the seas, they have procured, in different forms—the forms of sea-letter or license—a right to enjoy the protection and the privileges of foreign vessels, and have sailed under foreign flags, while their loyal neighbors, with the stars and stripes at their masthead, have been subjected to great embarrassments, which I need not detail here, for they are familiar to the gentlemen of the House. Now, sir, we have believed that when American owners have seen fit to seek that foreign protection, unless there were strong reasons why they should have done so, their vessels ought not now to retain the character of American ships.

I will say, sir, that I understand the decision at the Treasury Department to have been that where these vessels, although owned at home, have procured foreign licenses, they cannot, under the law as interpreted by that Department, be continued under American registers. If that decision were entirely safe—if that construction were, in the judgment of the committee, entirely sound—they would not probably have deemed this legislation necessary. But there is a doubt whether vessels which have continued in the hands of American owners but have been put under the protection of foreign flags may not have the right to sail again as American vessels; and it was believed that it was due to the loyal men who have suffered through this rebellion, who have clung to the flag, encountering the disadvantages and dangers to which their loyalty subjected them, that they should be recognized as the class to continue in the enjoyment of the right to float the flag upon their masts, and that those who have waived its privileges should not now seek to regain them, unless they can show that they ought, under the circumstances of the case, to have that right granted. In that case they will apply to Congress, and legislation can be had.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. ELIOT. I will do so.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, there is great disadvantage in acting upon an important bill like this, affecting the whole commerce of the Atlantic and the Pacific, as well as that of the lakes, without some better understanding of the bill than it is possible for us to have upon the mere reading of the bill by the Clerk. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he allow us to have the bill in a printed form before it be put upon its passage; or if it will suit the gentleman better, it might be passed to-day, with the understanding that it shall be printed, and shall be subject to reconsideration. Then the subject can be brought up and disposed of finally to-morrow.

While I am up, let me make an additional remark. Though the gentleman cites Baltimore as a place where these licenses have been taken, I will venture to say to him that, if the statistics could be obtained, they would show that more of such licenses have been taken in Massachusetts and Maine than in any other State of the Union. And why? Not because the ship-owners there were more disloyal than they were elsewhere, but because they have more shipping than the citizens of any other State in the Union except the State of New York. When the Federal Government was unable to protect its shipping, when piratical cruisers were abroad upon the ocean, partly in consequence of the indisposition of our Government to quarrel with foreign Powers, especially with France and England, because of the fitting out of such cruisers in those countries, every possible advantage was taken of foreign licenses and foreign flags for the purpose of securing the safe transportation of freights on the ocean. This disloyalty, if it was disloyalty, prevailed more in New England than in the State of Maryland; it prevailed most where there was most shipping.

I did not, however, rise to oppose the bill, but simply to ask that more time for examination be allowed before the bill be finally passed.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] allow me to say a word?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PIKE. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is under a misapprehension as to the State of Maine; for, if I understand the provisions of this bill, it does not effect the vessels transferred by the ship-owners of Maine, because almost all of those vessels were transferred to British owners. The British registry law requires that there shall be a British ownership in order to obtain a British register. If I understand it, the bill does not provide for that class of cases. And if the gentleman will allow me still further, I will say that while there were many loyal and well-meaning people who transferred ships during the war, the most of those who did so damned the flag that could not protect them. I am opposed to allowing any of them to come back.

Mr. BROOKS. That was the general feeling among the whole commerce of the country; and I have no doubt as many were sold as were licensed. If, therefore, there was any disloyalty in that, the disloyalty extended to all parts of the country.

I do not rise to support or oppose the bill, for I do not clearly understand its provisions. I want to read it in print, and then I will have some fixed opinions on the subject.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will consent to have the bill printed and laid before the House in proper form.

Mr. ELIOT. I yield now to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Lynch.]

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I hope that action on this important measure will not be deferred. I believe that immediate action is demanded. Every day vessels are coming back by an evasion of the present revenue laws, and are taking out American registers.

If gentlemen will refer to the law of December 23, 1852, they will find that it provides for the issue of American registers to foreign vessels wrecked and sold to an American, where the amount of repairs shall be three fourths of the value of the vessel when repaired. Under this law a great many vessels have obtained American registers. I have a long list of vessels which have obtained registers under this law through the custom-house at the port of New York; and it is a very significant fact that all of these vessels were formerly American and transferred during the war to a foreign flag. They come back in this way: a man who had put his vessel under a foreign flag, and has enjoyed all the advantages of its protection during the entire period of the rebellion, now desiring to procure an American register, adopts this ingenious plan to evade the law: the vessel is grounded at some obscure place along the coast, and is then advertised as a wrecked vessel in some obscure newspaper; the owner buys her in at a nominal price, purchases sails, anchors, and rigging, amounting to more than three times the price paid for the vessel, thus making the repairs amount to more than three fourths of the value of the vessel. After obtaining an American register these sails, anchors, and rigging are sold. More than twenty vessels have come back by thus evading this law. Others have come back under an opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury that vessels owned by Americans who took up a temporary residence in a foreign country during the war, and sailed during this time under a foreign flag and foreign register, were not divested of their American character. I think quite a number of vessels came back under this decision; but on the Secretary of the Treasury having his attention called to the subject, I believe he does not favor this construction of the law. I think it is agreed that an American vessel has a national character which does not depend wholly upon ownership.

Now, the question arises, whether it is right to allow vessels to come back in this way by an evasion of the spirit of the laws; whether it is just to those owners of vessels who have refused to desert the flag of their country in her hour of peril? It is a cowardly argument to offer in behalf of these ship-owners, to say the country could not protect them. On the same principle the whole population might leave with their property and place themselves under foreign protection. It is for the people to protect the country in time of war; they are part of the country, and ought not to desert her when in danger. It would certainly be dangerous policy for a nation to offer inducements for its citizens to desert with their property and identify their interests with its enemies in time of war.

Let me for a moment call the attention of members of this House to the position of these American ship-owners while their vessels enjoyed the protection of a foreign nation during the rebellion. Their interests were not only alienated from their own country, but were identified with foreign ship-owners, whose interests were promoted by a destruction of American commerce. Every American ship-owner whose vessel sailed under the flag of England during the rebellion had precisely the same pecuniary interest in the destruction of American commerce as had the English ship-owner.

Now, is it policy for the Government to allow, to encourage her citizens to desert her during war, and then to return with the return of peace and have the same advantages as those who have suffered by standing by her? I trust we shall not so decide.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question. What amount of tonnage will be affected by this proposition?

Mr. LYNCH. I cannot tell the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman I will answer that question. The Secretary of the Treasury has addressed a letter to the Committee on Commerce, in which he says that eight hundred thousand tons of our shipping have been transferred for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. May I then ask of either of the gentlemen this question? It is known that in the Danish war the commerce of the free cities of Germany sought a like protection. It is customary in all wars that private property on the seas shall protect itself in the best way it can where convoy is not furnished. Now, I wish to ask, what will be the effect of this upon the restoration of the amount of American shipping in foreign countries? And what will be the practical effect upon the commerce of the ocean now afloat if this is not adopted? It seems to be a practical question as to whether its adoption or rejection will best promote the prosperity of the commerce of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amount of foreign tonnage is about five millions; eight hundred thousand has been transferred.

Mr. LYNCH. I think the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is a little mistaken in his statement; or rather his statement would seem to convey a wrong impression. Eight hundred thousand tons of shipping I understand to be the whole amount that has been destroyed, sold, and transferred by these bogus transfers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no; eight hundred thousand has been transferred. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends distinctly the passage of this law. He believes that these men, after having transferred their ships in that way, and received the benefit of it, have no right to come back now and claim to come on the same footing with others.

Mr. LYNCH. I understand now from the gentleman from Illinois that eight hundred thousand tons have been transferred. But the gentleman will bear in mind that probably three fourths or seven eighths of those transfers were bona fide. A great many merchants found, when exchange was very high, that it was to their advantage to sell their shipping to foreigners. To that no one objects. Only a small percentage, perhaps, has passed under a foreign flag.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In this connection, to show the extent of this thing and the means supposed to be necessary in order to get it through Congress, I will ask the Clerk to read the following confidential circular which has been sent to me.

The Clerk read the circular, as follows:

BOSTON, November 1, 1865.

SIR: Having been advised that you have the control of an American-built vessel, which has been transferred to a foreign flag, we take this method of informing you that we propose to endeavor to procure the passage of an act of Congress restoring such vessels to the flag of the United States, and authorizing their registration as vessels of the United States. As the necessary preliminaries will involve quite an expenditure of time and money, we desire to be secured against loss by those peculiarly interested, and propose that a small amount (say ten cents per ton as by present register) be paid in advance by each party desirous of the passage of such an act. We have taken steps to interest all parties in the United States having vessels in the above condition, and think our facilities for securing the passage of this act are such as will insure success. Mr. J. W. Hannum, ship broker, No. 3 Commercial street, has the necessary paper for signature, and is authorized to receive the above-named subscription, to enable us to commence understandingly; and if considered favorably by you, we respectfully suggest that you call upon him at your earliest convenience, as it is necessary that immediate action should be taken.

Very respectfully, &c., R. S. S. ANDROS,

27 State Street.

J. P. TUCKER,

Late Surveyor Port of New Orleans.

P. S. For reasons which will be obvious to you, we request that you will regard this circular as confidential.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire now to call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. ELIOT. I would inquire of the Speaker when the morning hour will expire.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will expire twenty-eight minutes after one o'clock.

Mr. ELIOT. I yield.

Mr. SPALDING. If I had the honor, Mr. Speaker, to represent the State of Maine, as my learned friends do who have spoken on this question, I have no doubt I should be on the same side as they, because for a longer period of time than has passed over my head the ship-building interest of Maine has been protected by our registry laws. I hold that our ship-builders now can without this protection compete with those of any portion of the globe. There is no doubt about that. On the second day of the present session I introduced a bill to change our registry law to enable every bona fide American owner of a ship to obtain a register under our laws, subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. That bill is now in the hands of the committee; but I understand that it is to be given the go-by, and that our registry laws are to be preserved, as they have been for years to come, for the benefit of the ship-builders of Maine.

Now, sir, I commend the gentlemen for their industry in protecting their important interest. But I am the Representative of a section of the country which is engaged in commerce—inland commerce, if you please—but nevertheless an extensive interest, and one that is growing every day and every hour. And I am applied to every day by individual owners of vessels to have a law passed to give them the right to register vessels that have been bought from the Canadians. But they cannot have that privilege. On the contrary, if any of my constituents engaged in foreign commerce see fit to obtain a license of the British authorities, (which I hope none of them will be obliged to do,) for the purpose of running their vessels in the neighborhood of a piratical flag, they are now to be put under the ban. Why? I have yet to learn that lesson in ethics which makes it necessary to punish these men for resorting to this course for the purpose of protecting their property. Is there anything wrong in it? Is there anything unpatriotic in it? Because some portion of our citizens, unfortunately, I am sorry for it, have been compelled to make sacrifices of their ships fired upon the ocean by a piratical flag, ought we to have others of our citizens subjected to inconvenience, because they resorted to another mode to save their ships from the same disaster? What sort of morality calls for that?

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has but one minute more to speak.

Mr. SPALDING. I appeal to the Committee on Commerce to let this bill, which is of so much importance, be printed, and that a day be set apart when we can examine it and have a vote on it understandingly. That is all I ask.

Mr. PIKE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for one moment. I want to say a word or two.

Mr. ELIOT. I will yield three minutes to my friend from Maine.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has taken the remarkable position that American ships are by our registry laws largely protected in their business. I will ask him to tell me in what particular a ship of a thousand tons in the port of New York has any advantage over foreign ships save on voyages to California and coastwise, which, as we know, are of no sort of consequence to ships of that magnitude. In no other particular has she any advantage in the rate of freights, of insurance, or in any conceivable particular there or in any foreign port on this globe. Now, then, having no advantage whatever in these particulars, I say to him this, that in the Province of New Brunswick, and New Brunswick is but a duplicate of Canada, ships can be built to-day for forty dollars a ton that cost in the United States in our currency $100 a ton. I have from an accurate ship-builder a statement which I propose to exhibit to the House at the proper time of the amount of duties paid in gold upon the materials that enter into the construction of vessels, and on a seven hundred and fifty ton ship built last year there was paid the sum of $5,000 in gold for duties on materials to go into the construction of that ship. Now, every gentleman who knows anything about the cost of the construction of a ship of that magnitude knows that that simple item is sufficient, if continued, to transfer ship-building from the State of Maine or any other State in this Union to the British Provinces, where ship-builders escape all such duties.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's three minutes have expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. PIKE. Three minutes is a very short time in which to discuss the shipping interests of the country.

Mr. ELIOT. I must ask the previous question on the bill. If the House desires further discussion upon it, I have no objection to their voting it down.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will vote down the previous question. The West desires to be heard upon this question.

Mr. PIKE. American tonnage ought to be heard on it.

Mr. ELIOT. There seems to be a general wish to have this subject go over until to-morrow. I have no objection to its doing so, and I move that the bill be printed in the mean time.

The motion to print was agreed to; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. STEVENS. The joint committee on reconstruction, to which was recommitted joint resolution No. 51, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in relation to the basis of representation, together with all propositions submitted in this House in relation to that subject, have directed me to report the joint resolution back, modified to read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

I now move the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few moments to allow me to offer a substitute for his resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the demand for the previous question to enable the gentleman to offer his proposition, so that we may have a direct vote upon it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following as a substitute for the proposition reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number of male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age having the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The Congress, at their first session after the ratification of this amendment by the required number of States, shall provide by law for the actual enumeration of such voters; and such actual enumeration shall be separately made in a general census of the population of all the States within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as the Congress may by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every one hundred and twenty-five thousand of actual population, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania wherein the report which he now makes differs from the proposition which he formerly reported from the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee, in obedience to what they thought was a general feeling in this House, have struck out the words "and direct taxes," so as to leave that subject for the future action of Congress, if it shall be deemed necessary, without embarrassing the present proposition with it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The other proposition remains the same?

Mr. STEVENS. Precisely the same.

Mr. WRIGHT. In consideration of the gravity of this question, it being one which will affect the welfare of the nation, would there be any impropriety in having the report of the committee laid on the table for a short time, in order that it may be printed, so that members may know what they are called upon to decide?

Mr. STEVENS. As we have already had a week's debate upon this subject, and there is but a single change, striking out the words "and direct taxes," I cannot see the propriety of detaining the House longer upon it.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] allow me to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK?]

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield for any more propositions.

The question was upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and being taken, there were—ayes 73, noes 49.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] five minutes of my time, as he desires to make some explanation of his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of course I cannot, within that limited time, go into a prolonged explanation of the proposition I have submitted as a substitute for that reported by the joint committee.

If the members of this House will turn to their files and examine House resolution No. 1, as printed, they will find the amendment which I have just offered, with a few slight variations, which I will proceed to state. In the original resolution the word "apportioned" was misprinted "appointed;" that error is corrected. After the word "citizens" the words "of the United States" have been inserted, and near the close, after the words "one hundred," the words "and twenty-five" are inserted; so as to provide that the representation of a State shall never be less than one Representative for one hundred and twenty-five thousand of population. These are the only changes that I have made in the proposition as originally introduced by me at the commencement of this session.

I desire to submit to the several States an amendment to the Constitution which shall base representation upon suffrage, that right of suffrage to be exercised by male citizens of the United States over the age of twenty-one years, having the requisite qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of the State in which they respectively reside. It is a plain, practical proposition. It leaves to the census-takers to ascertain, when visiting the domiciles of the citizens, how many of them are voters within the terms of this description. It leaves no room for question as to whether any portion of the citizens of the State have been excluded from the right of voting on one account or on another. Nor is there required any estimate of the proportional number who have been included or excluded. In fact, it leaves nothing open for discussion, or wrangling, or difficulty, or difference in any Congress that shall be called upon to apportion Representatives upon the principle I have suggested.

This matter is one which has been discussed before the people very generally during the past year at least, and upon which I think the mass of them to a great extent have been informed. And I think if there is to be a cure for this evil of unequal representation, that cure had better be a plain, practical one, which shall give representation to the different States just in proportion to the number of persons within their limits that the States themselves say are competent and proper to take part in the Government of the country. The office of elector, for in one sense it is an office, is to be settled by the State organic law. And thus the number of persons fitted and qualified to take part in carrying on the government of this country being determined by each State for itself, it will then be left to Congress to apportion Representatives among the several States according to the number of persons thus qualified.

I would be glad to discuss some points connected with the question of the propriety of adopting this basis of representation more fully than I have yet done. But I cannot do so within the time allowed me. And with this very brief explanation I leave my proposition to meet its fate, hoping that we may have a direct vote upon it, which will manifest the sense of the House. Some remedy for this great evil of unequal relative representation must be provided in the Constitution of the nation; and if this, which I think the best, amendment to that end be not adopted, we must agree upon some other plan that will.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to grant me five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the gentleman that much of my time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, the State of Missouri, which would be more sensibly affected by the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] than any other State represented upon this floor, has not yet had an opportunity to express herself, through her representation here, upon this question.

If I correctly understand the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, it proposes to base representation upon voters as determined by the laws of the respective States. It is well known to every gentleman upon this floor that the State of Missouri has endeavored, and as she thinks, has succeeded, in placing the government of that State in loyal hands; in other words, she has disfranchised the rebel element of that State. In doing this she has probably disfranchised one half of the voters of that State. Hence, by the adoption of the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio the delegation of the State of Missouri on this floor would be reduced from nine members to a number not exceeding four. By the adoption of this proposition we should virtually say to that State "If you remove that restriction upon the rebel element of that State, so that that element shall control the destiny of that State and send a rebel delegation to Congress, you may continue to have nine members; but if, on the other hand, you adhere to that restriction which you have imposed, you shall have only three or four Representatives." The adoption of this proposition would virtually say the same thing to every one of the southern States that is to-day knocking at our doors for admission. You would thereby say to the State of Louisiana, "If you shall reconstruct upon the principle which has been adopted by Missouri and Maryland, you shall be restricted to one member; whereas if you permit the whole of the rebel element within your borders to control your destinies you shall have five Representatives."

The reconstruction policy of Missouri we of that State hold up as a model for imitation by the States of the South; and I for one declare here to-day that when any one of the lately rebellious States shall present herself here, taking the same position that Missouri has taken, showing a determination to place and continue in loyal hands the destinies of the State, I am ready at any time to vote for the admission of such State. The effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, so far as regards Missouri, would be to a great extent to stifle the Union sentiment of the State. The representatives of the Union cause there would be unable to go before the people and sustain themselves under the operation of such an amendment. The proposition would prove in its practical workings decidedly unjust in every State where the rebel element prevails, and more particularly in the State I in part represent. I hope this House is not disposed to perpetrate such an injustice.

Mr. Speaker, another objection to this proposition is that it is impracticable; it cannot be carried out. The right of suffrage in the State of Missouri is based upon the oath of the party. No individual can deposit his ballot unless he subscribes an oath that during the rebellion he has been loyal and has never in any manner given aid or comfort to the enemy. Are you going to require the census-taker to hunt out every male citizen of the State and administer to each one that oath? You cannot ascertain who are voters in that State except by tendering to every male citizen the oath prescribed by the laws of that State. Will you say to the census-taker in that State that he shall personally propose to every male citizen of the State that oath of loyalty, and shall count every man who takes it? Everybody can see that such a thing is utterly impracticable. The census-taker would fail to find many who were really entitled to vote. Thus a portion of the loyal men, the voters of the State, would be excluded from the enumeration, and thus the representation from our State would be still further reduced. I contend that it would be utterly impossible for the census-taker to ascertain the exact number of those really entitled to the right of suffrage; and thus the injustice of the proposition is still further aggravated.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, all I shall attempt on this occasion is to place before the House distinctly, and I hope intelligibly, the true meaning of the proposition submitted by the committee, noticing slightly the objections which have been made to it.

It is true we have been informed by high authority, at the other end of the avenue, introduced through an unusual conduit, that no amendment is necessary to the Constitution as our fathers made it, and that it is better to let it stand as it is. Now, sir, I think very differently, myself, for one individual. I believe there is intrusted to this Congress a high duty, no less important and no less fraught with the weal or woe of future ages than was intrusted to the august body that made the Declaration of Independence. I believe now, if we omit to exercise that high duty, or abuse it, we shall be held to account by future generations of America, and by the whole civilized world that is in favor of freedom, and that our names will go down to posterity with some applause, or with black condemnation if we do not treat the subject thoroughly, honestly, and justly, in reference to every human being on this continent.

Sir, our fathers made the Declaration of Independence; and that is what they intended to be the foundation of our Government. If they had been able to base their Constitution on the principles of that Declaration it would have needed no amendment during all time, for every human being would have had his rights; every human being would have been equal before the law; and no oppression could have been effected except through usurpation against the principles of that Government.

But it so happened when our fathers came to reduce the principles on which they founded this Government into order, in shaping the organic law, an institution hot from hell appeared among them, which has been increasing in volume and guilt ever since. It obstructed all their movements and all their actions, and precluded them from carrying out their own principles into the organic law of this Union. But rather than not have harmony among those thirteen colonies, they postponed and compromised. They compromised their principles for what they deemed a greater good, believing a short time would work a cure, and purify the institution which they admitted to be clogged by it.

At that day ninety bales of cotton left the United States in one year, and now we have millions of bales exported; then but few slaves comparatively existed, there being only three millions of the whole population, and now the black population has risen above the whole population of that day to four millions, who are either to be treated as our fathers declared by solemn declaration they ought to be treated, or to be oppressed by us as insolent tyrants, by which we will deserve the execrations of the human race. It has come to that. The time has come when we can make the Constitution what our fathers desired to make it. The time has come when through blood every stain has been washed out unless we choose to reestablish it.

God forbid I should so adopt the principle of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] that this Constitution needs no amendment. I would rather not live than live and be so disgraced by such a sentiment. Now, when everything is in our power; when the rebels have lifted their parricidal hands against the country, and cut themselves off from every right under the laws of the Union, and every right under a repudiated Constitution, shall we so recall this desire of our fathers as to place it upon the broad foundation of human rights, or shall we still cut off a portion of those rights, and still crush beneath our feet four million immortal men? That is the question presented to us; and yet we are told that no amendment is necessary. Sir, let me tell the gentleman who says this, and those who say it, for his public information now, and for the information of philanthropists and the friends of freedom and of the human race, that I do not envy them the position in which this, and only this, will put them. Excuse me, sir, for going so far in my remarks at this time.

Mr. RAYMOND. I rise simply to remark that if the gentleman understood me to say no amendments whatever were needed to the Constitution, and the Constitution was better without them, he misunderstood me, for I expressly said in this very point of representation that some amendment was necessary.

Mr. STEVENS. I refer not only to the gentleman from New York, but to what I take to be an authorized utterance of one at the other end of the avenue. I am glad the gentleman has explained it in that way.

Now, sir, since I have referred to that, I believe I am right, for I have no doubt that this is the proclamation, the command of the President of the United States, made and put forth by authority in advance, and at a time when this Congress was legislating on this very question; made, in my judgment, in violation of the privileges of this House; made in such a way that centuries ago, had it been made to Parliament by a British king, it would have cost him his head. But, sir, we pass that by; we are tolerant of usurpation in this tolerant Government of ours.

Now, sir, let me consider what is the meaning of the proposition made by the committee; how far it ought to be affected by any modifications. It has been amended by the committee in obedience to what is supposed to be the sense of the House. The committee have reported back the simple proposition that representation shall be apportioned among the States in proportion to their numbers, provided that when the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

But some of our friends are apprehensive that this is an implied permission to the States to regulate the elective franchise within the States. Now, sir, I venture to say that there is no good philologist who, upon reading this proposed amendment, will for a single moment pretend that it either grants a privilege or takes away a privilege from any State on that subject. It does, however, punish the abuse of that privilege if it exists. Now, I hold that the States have the right, and always have had it, to fix the elective franchise within their own States. And I hold that this does not take it from them. Ought it to take it from them? Ought the domestic affairs of the States to be infringed upon by Congress so far as to regulate the restrictions and qualifications of their voters? How many States would adopt such a proposition? How many would allow Congress to come within their jurisdiction to fix the qualification of their voters? Would New York? Would Pennsylvania? Would the northwestern States? I am sure not one of them would. Therefore, if you should take away the right which now is and always has been exercised by the States, by fixing the qualification of their electors, instead of getting nineteen States, which is necessary to ratify this amendment, you might possibly get five. I venture to say you could not get five in this Union. And that is an answer, in the opinion of the committee, to all that has been said on this subject. But it grants no right. It says, however, to the State of South Carolina and other slave States, true, we leave where it has been left for eighty years the right to fix the elective franchise, but you must not abuse it; if you do, the Constitution will impose upon you a penalty, and will continue to inflict it until you shall have corrected your actions.

Now, any man who knows anything about the condition of aspiration and ambition for power which exists in the slave States knows that one of their chief objects is to rule this country. It was to ruin it if they could not rule it. They have not been able to ruin it, and now their great ambition will be to rule it. If a State abuses the elective franchise and takes it from those who are the only loyal people there, the Constitution says to such a State, you shall lose power in the halls of the nation, and you shall remain where you are, a shriveled and dried-up nonentity instead of being the lords of creation, as you have been, so far as America is concerned, for years past.

Now, sir, I say no more strong inducement could ever be held out to them, no more severe punishment could ever be inflicted upon them as States. If they exclude the colored population they will lose at least thirty-five Representatives in this Hall. If they adopt it they will have eighty-three votes. Take it away from them and they will have only from forty-five to forty-eight votes, all told, in this Hall; and then, sir, let them have all the copperhead assistance they can get, and liberty will still be triumphant. Now, I prefer that to an immediate declaration that all shall be represented; for if you make them all voters and let them into this Hall, not one beneficial act for the benefit of the freedmen or for the benefit of the country could ever be passed. Their eighty-three votes, with the Representatives of the Five Points and other dark corners, would be sufficient to overrule the friends of progress here, and this nation would be in the hands of secessionists at the very next congressional election and at the very next presidential election. I do not, therefore, want to grant them this privilege at least for some years. I want, in the mean time, that our Christian men shall go among the freedmen and teach them what their duties are as citizens; they know them now much better than their masters, and I hope their masters will take notice of what they learn. I say I want our Christian men to go among them, the philanthropists of the North, the honest Methodists, my friends, the Hard-shell Baptists, and all others; and then, four or five years hence, when these freedmen shall have been made free indeed, when they shall have become intelligent enough, and there are sufficient loyal men there to control the representation from those States, I shall be glad to see them admitted here. But I do not want them to have representation—I say it plainly—I do not want them to have the right of suffrage before this Congress has done the great work of regenerating the Constitution and laws of this country according to the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

Hence I object to the amendment of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHRECK.] He says that if we allow these people representation in proportion as they extend the suffrage we shall encourage them to extend it to the colored race. Well, that is the very objection. They will give the suffrage to their menials, their house servants, those they can control, and elect whom they please to make our laws. That is not the kind of increase of suffrage I want. I want all such men cut off from it. But when they have said to all the freedmen, to the former slaves, "You are men and you shall be represented," then let them come here. I shall not be here to see them, as I did their masters, who a few years since drew pistols and daggers upon me when I was making such a speech as this, yet a free people will be here represented, and they will take care of themselves.

But I have another objection to the amendment of my friend from Ohio. His proposition is to apportion representation according to the male citizens of the States. Why has he put in that word "male?" It was never in the Constitution of the United States before. Why make a crusade against women in the Constitution of the nation? [Laughter.] Is my friend as much afraid of their rivalry as the gentlemen on the other side of the House are afraid of the rivalry of the negro? [Laughter.] I do not think we ought to disfigure the Constitution with such a provision. I find that every unmarried man is opposed to the proposition. Whether married men have particular reason for dreading interference from that quarter I know not. [Laughter.] I certainly shall never vote to insert the word "male" or the word "white" in the national Constitution. Let these things be attended to by the States.

Now, sir, there is another fatal objection to the proposition of my friend from Ohio. If I have been rightly informed as to the number, there are from fifteen to twenty Representatives in the northern States founded upon those who are not citizens of the United States. In New York I think there are three or four Representatives founded upon the foreign population, three certainly. And so it is in Wisconsin, Iowa, and other northern States. There are fifteen or twenty northern Representatives that would be lost by that amendment and given to the South whenever they grant the elective franchise to the negro.

Now, sir, while I have not any particular regard for any foreigner who goes against me, yet I do not think it would be wise to put into the Constitution or send to the people a proposition to amend the Constitution which would take such Representatives from those States, and which therefore they will never adopt. I have no hope that any such proposition would ever be adopted. Let us try to be practical. On the 6th day of December last I introduced a proposition to amend the Constitution founding representation upon the voting basis and excluding the foreign population, as the proposition of my friend from Ohio does. It was dear to my heart, for I had been gestating it for three months. [Laughter.] But when I came to consult the committee of fifteen and found that the States would not adopt it, I surrendered it. Now, cannot my friend from Ohio give up his darling, too? [Laughter.]

I had another proposition, which I hope may again be brought forward. It is this:

All national and State laws shall be equally applicable to every citizen, and no discrimination shall be made on account of race or color.

There is the genuine proposition; that is the one I love; that is the one which I hope, before we separate, we shall have educated ourselves up to the idea of adopting, and that we shall have educated our people up to the point of ratifying. But it would not be wise to entangle the present proposition with that one. The one might drag down the other; and although I have not obtained what I want, I am content to take what, after comparing ideas with others, I believe we can carry through the States; and I believe we can carry this proposition.

Some gentlemen say this principle if adopted will be abused. Some learned gentlemen on the other side, for whose feelings I have great regard, seem to think so. And when I say "on the other side" I do not want to be misunderstood—I mean some of our friends on the other side of the Chamber. [Laughter.] The others there have not spoken; but I have as much regard for the others when they speak. It is said that this principle might be evaded by saying that no man who had ever been a slave shall vote, and that that would not be a disfranchisement on account of race or color. Allow me to say that that suggestion must have been made hastily and not with that well-considered judgment which generally characterizes those gentlemen. Sir, no man in America ever was or ever could be a slave if he was a white man. I know white men have been held in bondage contrary to law. But there never was a court in the United States, in a slave State or a free State, that has not admitted that if one held as a slave could prove himself to be white he was that instant free. And therefore such an exclusion, on account of previous condition of slavery, must be an exclusion on account of race or color. Therefore that objection falls to the ground.

Now, the question is narrowed down to the sole question of a choice between the proposition of the committee and the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] There is no necessity, then, unless I desire to exhibit myself, for my proceeding any farther in this matter. Nor do I propose to go into an examination of what was perhaps the not quite pertinent argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND.] All I want is that two thirds of each branch of this Congress shall vote affirmatively on this question. And while I should take pleasure in having the President approve of our conduct, yet he has nothing to say about it on this question. We do not send it to him and ask his opinion about it, and therefore it was all the more kind in him to send us his opinion without being asked for it.

Mr. SMITH. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to permit to be read the paper which has called forth his remarks, so that we may understand to what he alludes when he speaks of the President undertaking to dictate to Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to having it read, except that it will take more time than its importance warrants.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The following is the substance of a conversation which took place yesterday between the President and a distinguished Senator, as telegraphed North by the agent of the Associated Press:

"The President said that he doubted the propriety at this time of making further amendments to the Constitution. One great amendment had already been made, by which slavery had forever been abolished within the limits of the United States, and a national guarantee thus given that the institution should never exist in the land. Propositions to amend the Constitution were becoming as numerous as preambles and resolutions at town meetings called to consider the most ordinary questions connected with the administration of local affairs. All this, in his opinion, had a tendency to diminish the dignity and prestige attached to the Constitution of the country, and to lessen the respect and confidence of the people in their great charter of freedom. If, however, amendments are to be made to the Constitution, changing the basis of representation and taxation, (and he did not deem them at all necessary at the present time,) he knew of none better than a simple proposition, embraced in a few lines, making in each State the number of qualified voters the basis of representation, and the value of property the basis of direct taxation. Such a proposition could be embraced in the following terms:

"Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number of qualified voters in each State.

"Direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the value of all taxable property in each State."

"An amendment of this kind would, in his opinion, place the basis of representation and direct taxation upon correct principles. The qualified voters were, for the most part, men who were subject to draft and enlistment when it was necessary to repel invasion, suppress rebellion, and quell domestic violence and insurrection. They risk their lives, shed their blood, and peril their all to uphold the Government and give protection, security, and value to property. It seemed but just that property should compensate for the benefits thus conferred by defraying the expenses incident to its protection and enjoyment.

"Such an amendment, the President also suggested, would remove from Congress all issues in reference to the political equality of the races. It would leave the States to determine absolutely the qualifications of their own voters with regard to color; and thus the number of Representatives to which they would be entitled in Congress would depend upon the number upon whom they conferred the right of suffrage.

"The President, in this connection, expressed the opinion that the agitation of the negro-franchise question in the District of Columbia at this time was the mere entering wedge to the agitation of the question throughout the States, and was ill-timed, uncalculated, and calculated to do great harm. He believed that it would engender enmity, contention, and strife between the two races, and lead to a war between them which would result in great injury to both, and the certain extermination of the negro population. Precedence, he thought, should be given to more important and urgent matters, legislation upon which was essential for the restoration of the Union, the peace of the country, and the prosperity of the people."

Mr. STEVENS. I am rather glad the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] called for the reading of that paper, because it shows that the President and I agree exactly, on one point at least; for he leaves out the word "male" in condemnation of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I am very glad he called for the reading of the paper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS. Very well.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman by what authority does he claim that the paper just read expresses the views of the President?

Mr. STEVENS. I think I have good reasons for saying that it emanated from the President.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Has the gentleman any objection to stating what those reasons are?

Mr. STEVENS. I have no right to tell the secrets of the Executive. [Laughter.]

But we know perfectly well that the President has nothing to do with this matter. The passage of this amendment by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress will carry it before the State Legislatures for ratification without regard to the approval or disapproval of the President. It is true that the constitutional amendment for the abolition of slavery was, after its passage by both Houses of Congress, sent inadvertently to President Lincoln for his signature. But although he signed it because he approved it, yet, acting with the sagacity and the modesty which were so characteristic of him, he sent to Congress a message stating that that body, in sending him that joint resolution for approval, had done what the Constitution did not require. We shall not trouble President Johnson by sending him this amendment if it should be passed by Congress, because it is not necessary to submit it to him for his approval.

As I said before, I do not intend to refer particularly to the able, elaborate, and eloquent speech of my friend from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] because that speech had, to a great extent, no connection whatever with this question, except, possibly, so far as the status of the States may be affected by this amendment. He still persists in saying that the seceded States are, and always have been, in the Union; that the Constitution would not allow them to go out. He took the same ground before. I had undertaken to prove that they were out of the Union, not by our consent, but by operation of law. I had stated that they formed the confederate government as States; that they had raised large armies; that they had done what no State could constitutionally do, issued letters of marque which were recognized by us and the civilized world. There is no doubt, sir, that for three years we acknowledged that rebel government as a belligerent, as did the whole civilized world. But whether we so acknowledged the rebels or not, the law of nations declares that when they had established a government, and maintained themselves for a sufficient length of time to rise above the position of mere murderers or insurrectionists, they became belligerents; and it does not make a particle of difference whether the parent Government recognizes them as belligerents. In this case, however, the acknowledgment of our own Government and the well-settled doctrine of the law of nations combined in conceding to the States in rebellion this position.

The gentleman cannot deny this state of facts; and yet he reiterates the doctrine, "once a State always a State." May I be pardoned for reading a paragraph from Vattel?

"When a nation becomes divided into two parties absolutely independent, and no longer acknowledging a common superior, the State is dissolved, and the war between the two parties stands on the same ground in every respect as a public war between two different nations."

Again, I read:

"The conventions, the treaties, made with a nation are broken or annulled by a war arising between the contracting parties."

This is the doctrine of Vattel, as well as of Grotius and Rutherford and Puffendorf. The gentleman from New York denies it. I admit the weight of the gentleman's authority; but I am not willing that all those sages of the law, clad in the panoply of ages, and fortified by the opinion of the civilized world, should be broken down and annihilated by the single arm of my friend from New York, however powerful he may be in assault and cunning in defense.

One word as to another portion of the gentleman's speech. I could not but admire (an admiration mingled with wonder) the amiability of temper, the tenderness of heart, the generosity of feeling, which must have prompted some of the closing sentences of the excellent and able speech delivered by the gentleman on last Monday. His words were these:

"The gigantic contest is at an end. The courage and devotion on either side which made it so terrible and so long, no longer owe a divided duty, but have become the common property of the American name, the priceless possession of the American Republic, through all time to come. The dead of the contending hosts sleep beneath the soil of a common country, under their common flag. Their hostilities are hushed, and they are the dead of the nation forevermore."

Sir, much more than amiable, much more than religious must be the sentiment that would prompt any man to say that "the courage and devotion" which so long withstood our arms, prolonging the terrible conflict of war, and sacrificing the lives of thousands of loyal men, are hereafter to be the common boast of the nation, "the priceless possession of the American Republic through all time to come;" that it is the pride of our country so many infamous rebels were so ferocious in their murders.

Sir, we are to consider these dead on both sides as the dead of the nation, the common dead! And so I suppose we are to raise monuments beside the monuments to Reynolds and others to be erected in the cemetery on the battle-field of Gettysburg; we must there build high the monumental marble for men like Barksdale, whom I have seen in this Hall draw their bowie-knives on the Representative of the people; men who died upon the battle-field of Gettysburg in arms against the Government, and where they now lie buried in ditches "unwept, unhonored, and unsung!" They are, I suppose, to be raised and put into the fore-front ranks of the nation, and we are to call them through all time as the dead of the nation! Sir, was there ever blasphemy before like this? Who was it burnt the temple of Ephesus? Who was it imitated the thunder of Jove? All that was poor compared with this blasphemy. I say if the loyal dead, who are thus associated with the traitors who murdered them, put by the gentleman on the same footing with them, and are to be treated as the "common dead of the nation"—I say, sir, if they could have heard the gentleman they would have broken the ceremonies of the tomb and stalked forth and haunted him until his eye-balls were seared.

Mr. RAYMOND. May I ask the gentleman's indulgence for one moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Wait until after the vote has been taken.

Mr. RAYMOND. There will be no time then; I prefer it now. It is simply for a personal explanation.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman in his closing remarks has misapprehended and misstated both my words and my meaning. I take it for granted the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and every other gentleman of this House, can distinguish between courage as an element of character, and the cause in which that courage has been shown; and I am sure there is no man upon this floor who will not say that the courage, the persistent determination, shown by the rebels in their resistance to the Government, if shown in a good cause, would have been worthy of all admiration and respect. I was speaking of that courage as a quality of character, not of the cause in which it was shown; and what I meant to say—and what I trust I shall not be accused of blasphemy for saying—is simply this: that that courage, if it had been shown under a common flag, in a common cause with us, to sustain the flag and glory of this great country, would have done honor to the American name. I have no hesitation in expressing for it my admiration in that sense and to that extent.

As to building monuments to the rebel dead and singing peans in their praise, I have only to say that the whole of it is a figment of the gentleman's very prolific imagination. I neither said nor intimated anything which could bear any such construction.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me, in reply to the gentleman, read from his speech:

"The gigantic contest is at an end. The courage and devotion on either side which made it so terrible and so long, no longer owe a divided duty, but have become the common property of the American name, the priceless possession of the American Republic through all time to come. The dead of the contending hosts sleep beneath the soil of a common country, under their common flag. Their hostilities are hushed, and they are the dead of the nation forevermore. The victor may well exult in the victory he has achieved. Let it be our task, as it will be our highest glory, to make the vanquished and their posterity to the latest generation rejoice in their defeat."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour has now expired.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. As the previous question has been seconded and no further debate on the question is in order, I ask permission of the House to print some remarks which I intended to deliver on the subject.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

[The speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until the first Monday in December next.

The SPEAKER stated the motion was not in order as the main question had been ordered to be now put.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's substitute.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 29, nays 131, not voting 23; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Chandler, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburt, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alex. H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanklin, Smith, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—131.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Culver, Driggs, Dumont, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Henderson, Higby, Jones, Loan, McRuer, Newell, Radford, Raymond, Ritter, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Stillwell, Trowbridge, Winfield, and Woodbridge—23.

So the substitute was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. JOHNSON stated that his colleague, Mr. GLOSSBRENNER, was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The joint resolution, as modified by the joint committee, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the adoption of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question should be taken by yeas and nays, as it requires a two-third vote under the Constitution, and the Chair would not like to decide on its own count whether there were two thirds voting in the affirmative or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call for the reading of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the joint resolution as modified by the committee; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 46, not voting 16; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chandler, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, Whaley, and Wright—46.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Culver, Driggs, Dumont, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Henderson, Higby, Jones, Loan, McRuer, Newell, Radford, Trowbridge, and Winfield—16.

The SPEAKER. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, I declare the joint resolution to have been adopted.

Mr. LONGYEAR, during the roll-call, stated that his colleague, Mr. DRIGGS, was absent on leave.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the House reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOLDING AN EVENING SESSION.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask now unanimous consent to take a recess and have an evening session? Last evening there was a failure. Some gentlemen were ready and others were not.

Mr. BROOKS. With the understanding that no business be done?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly; to have discussion only on the President's message.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The House then resumed the consideration of the special order, being Senate bill No. 60, to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, with certain amendments reported in the nature of a substitute from the select committee on the Freedmen's Bureau, Mr. DAWSON being entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill under consideration in all its provisions, and I trust that before I have concluded my remarks I shall have furnished some reasons why it should not become a law.

In venturing to claim the attention of the House and speak to the state of the nation, I feel it a circumstance demanding my first and most grateful recognition that we are here once more to legislate for a united country. Next to the overthrow of the Government and the ruin of the country, the greatest of national calamities is a great civil war. With the legions of miseries which hang around the march of hostile armies four years of carnage had made us so familiar that we had begun to grow callous under the repeated exhibition. Death on the most extended scale, numbering its victims by thousands, inflicted by the bullet, by disease, and by famine; mutilation in every horrid form; households stricken by the loss of friends, and under the dark shadow of inconsolable grief—these are but a few of the sad incidents to war, and most of all to war between brethren.

For this propitious result I deem it proper to render, with prompt and unflinching heartiness, my tribute of praise to that valor, skill, and endurance of our armies which have been exhibited since the outbreak of the rebellion. It is a matter of common pride, and not of party triumph, that through all the trials of the war order in general prevailed in the North. Supported by the love of country, the people of the North have patiently borne, in the invasion of their rights of person and property, and in new modes of trial, flagrant abuses of power.

In common with the great party to which I belong, I have differed from the directors of our national councils as to the original necessity for the war; as to its purposes when undertaken; as to the measures adopted for securing the proposed results; and to the necessity of protracting the struggle, at such frightful expenditure of blood and treasure, to its recent close. I have heretofore declared my faith in the efficacy of a different policy, in securing, at an early day, every legitimate and proper result; and I am still of opinion that, if the policy of peace upon the constitutional basis had been assented to, peace might have been had two years earlier, with a saving of the horrible bloodshed which we have witnessed since, involving a quarter of a million lives; with a saving of one half the war debt, and of that terrible and almost irreparable destruction of property, and that political and social disorganization which are the legacies entailed by the war upon the statesmen of to-day. But peace, though gained even at such tremendous sacrifices, is yet not the less precious, not the less grateful. But now that the war has reached its close, it appears to me that the country, with a view to the preservation of everything valuable in our institutions, had never more need of calm and enlightened action on the part of its rulers. In returning to that normal condition from which we were so rudely jostled by late occurrences, it is incumbent on us to meet the new condition of things with a spirit alike tenacious of established principles, and averse to precipitate change under the imputed character of reform. We must see to it that the grand features of our political system, conceived in such wisdom by the fathers, and the liberties of the American citizen, inherited mainly from our ancestors, may be preserved in their purity and vigor, without any taint of feebleness or stain upon their luster.

I do not say that it is entirely practicable to rid ourselves of partisan prejudice, but we must do so if we would see our conclusions verified by time. The petty passions of the hour must be discarded, when our deliberations are to affect not only the present, but unborn generations. We may all concede to our extremest opponents the merit of upright intentions; but we are equally to remember, that well-intentioned ignorance has filled the world with suffering. This is a truth emblazoned, in melancholy characters, upon every page of history. Hence the necessity, in a great juncture like the present, of obtaining full and correct information upon the issues which we have to settle; of contemplating with such breadth of vision, the material facts of the situation, as shall enable us truly to apprehend their bearings and relations. For the views which I now advance I assume no other merit than that of a careful, earnest, and, so far as I am conscious, of a disinterested examination of the subjects which are now the center of the common interest.

The close of the war, then, finds us surrounded with a set of questions of the highest importance. The true theory of our Government often announced, and often, alas! lost sight of, must be perseveringly reasserted and maintained. A solution must be found for the problem of our national debt and finances, so that the country may be relieved of its burdens, and again enjoy a currency of intrinsic value, as contemplated by the Constitution. Our domestic and foreign trade must be settled upon the basis of sound economical principles, and restored to those harmonizing and fructifying channels from which unhappy events have diverted them. The privileges and immunities of the American citizen must be so clearly defined that they may be secure from usurpation in war as well as in peace. The limits of martial law must be settled with such distinctness that it may not be permitted to supplant the civil, and that it may not be stretched by the hand of power to partisan purposes and individual oppression. The Union must be restored upon the constitutional basis of absolute and perfect equality of the States. The restoration should be immediate and the reunion cordial. The dignity of the country, as well as its safety, must further be supported by the unqualified reassertion of the Monroe doctrine.

It would be a fatal error to suppose that now that the war has been concluded under a Republican Administration the popular seal has been set upon the Federal theory of consolidation. Those who entertain this idea must remember that the popular support of the war was prompted by the determination to preserve the integrity of the Union. No sanction was thereby intended of any change in the Constitution, either in letter or by construction.

I maintain, sir, and it has ever been maintained by the Democratic party, that the State-rights doctrines, properly stated, present the true theory of the Government. The question arose in the contest between Jefferson and Adams in 1801, and the election of Mr. Jefferson was a popular vindication of these doctrines as against the Hamiltonian theory of centralization supported by Mr. Adams.

The Federal idea, which it was attempted to realize by a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, was that of a consolidated system of government, in which the undelegated powers of the States were to be absorbed, and the spirit of monarchy to be thus infused into our democratic forms. The assumption by the central power of the disposition of those details which the Constitution left to the States was to operate, as far as the States were concerned, as a consolidated despotism. It was the favorite tenet of the Federal faith that force or interest were the only successful means of governing men. Force being excluded by the nature of the case, the resort was necessarily to the influences of corruption; and Government patronage, in its multifarious branches and details, was to crown the execution of the plan. As far as Hamilton's influence extended, and it was very potent, this turn had been given to the policy of the first Administration under Washington. Hence the bitterness with which they contested every inch of debatable ground. Historically, and in the light of the simple facts, there could be no doubt of the correctness of the Democratic view.

The States or colonies had been independent of each other before the Revolution, each owing allegiance only to the British Crown. When by the success of the Revolution that allegiance became severed, the sovereignty, which before resided in the monarch, reverted to each independent community or State. In acceding to the new Government, the States acted upon their own separate responsibilities as sovereignties, and not by a simultaneous act of the people of all the States as individuals. When, then, we seek to ascertain the kind of Government which they adopted, we have only to turn to the provisions of the charter by which they agreed to be bound. We there find that they surrendered the control, as separate communities, over certain subjects, the disposition of which they determined to be more wisely vested in a central Government. In so doing, the sovereignty of the peoples of the several States and their allegiance became a divided one. The sovereignty, within the sphere of the granted powers, was in the central Government, and allegiance due to it within that sphere. As to the powers not specifically granted in the charter, they remained with the States, in which they had always been, constituting the State sovereignty, which rightfully claims, within the sphere of the reserved or ungranted powers, the allegiance and rightful obedience of every citizen within their respective territories.

This was the true Democratic doctrine in the days of Jefferson, and it is the true Democratic doctrine now. Extreme men of the Federal school, from that day to this, have ignored State rights, while extreme men of the opposite view have repudiated the authority of the central Government in cases where it properly exists. Jefferson assumed his position between these two extremes of consolidation and secession. In that "golden mean" he planted the party of which he was the illustrious founder, and there it has ever since remained. His policy was conservative alike of the constitutional powers of the central Government and of those of the States, and opposed to the extreme Federalists and extreme State-sovereignty men.

The Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, which embody the doctrine of State rights, were commented upon by President Johnson in his able speech in the Senate in 1861. He stated with fidelity their true history and meaning.

The views of the extreme State-sovereignty men, as reduced to practice in the act of secession, have been suppressed by physical force, and the just authority of the Government has been successfully and rightfully reestablished. But the doctrine of State rights is in nowise affected by the result. It remains the only true and stable foundation of our republican system. State rights comprehend that portion of the State sovereignty not delegated by the Constitution to the Federal Government, and the two expressions are of coextensive and identical import. That the States are sovereign in this sense; that is as possessing all the undelegated powers of sovereignty, it is late in the day to question. The Union was thus the result of mutual concession; and from the testimony of its founders could not have been formed in any other way.

The country although relieved by the war is without a reliable currency. Gold, as the constitutional standard of value, has been departed from, and a currency immensely inflated based on the national debt has taken its place. It has further to struggle with the great and galling evils induced by the contraction of a war debt so vast that the mind sinks in the effort to grasp its magnitude. Instead of adhering to a currency of the constitutional standard, the precious metals or paper convertible into them at the will of the holder, resort was had to paper which represented no value in the possession of the Government, which was inconvertible, and represented only so much public indebtedness.

It could not have been through ignorance that Mr. Chase, the financial minister, inaugurated this expedient at the sacrifice of the constitutional currency by the introduction of the legal tender. It was not only a violation of the Constitution, but confiscation of private estates, an unsettling of all values, and a fatal stab at the foundation of financial integrity. Our own revolutionary experience must have been present to his mind. The disastrous experience of France under Laid, Necker, Turgot, and Colonne, was uttering through the voice of history its decisive condemnation of the plan. He has then in defiance of such experience and constitutional obligation committed the country to a scheme calculated long to embarrass his successors, and from which the present generation will in vain look for relief.

In January, 1861, the circulation of all the banks in the United States was $202,005,000. The amount of specie in the banks was $87,674,000. The currency was gold or convertible paper, at the will of the holder. The expenditures of the Government were at the same time about $83,000,000 per annum, which was fully met by the revenue, and there was but about $75,000,000 of public debt. At the present time the Government debt, on the 31st October, 1865, is stated at $2,740,854,750. Add to this $600,000,000 which it will take to equalize bounties, together with the millions that will be required to pay damages to the property of loyal men occasioned by the armies, with the additional millions to pay pensions, and we have a debt equalled only by that of Great Britain, contracted in centuries of foreign wars. The estimated expenses for the present fiscal year, as stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, are $857,921,717 47. To meet these and discharge the interest on the public debt, we have only the receipts, actual and estimated, the current fiscal year, from customs, of $147,009,583 03, the inconsiderable receipts from the public lands amounting to $632,890 63, from direct tax $31,111 30, and those from internal revenue amounting to $271,618,885 65, and from miscellaneous sources to $48,393,729 94. The balance, amounting to $389,377,207 77, is reduced, by the application of $277,182,260 57 of borrowed money, to the sum, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, of $112,104,047 20, which is still to be provided for in the method adopted by Mr. Chase of Government loans or inconvertible promises to pay.

It is the evil of paper currency, that while the debt of the country represented by bonds and bills is but a substitute for capital, in the absence of any check arising from the necessity of redemption in specie, it is continually tending to augmentation. This is because inflation first raises prices, and more inflation is demanded at each step of the progress. With a given amount of circulation, prices at once adjust themselves to that amount; but when this is once done, the increase of the circulation goes no further than the circulation before the inflation. Hence the same reason which begat the first inflation begets a second.

It is obvious that under the system which has thus been fastened on the country there must be a deficit, not only the present year, but for years to come. A regard to sound principles imperatively requires, that, unless we are content to run along the high-road to bankruptcy and ruin and practical repudiation, adequate provision should be made for discharging with certainty and promptness the annual interest upon every addition to the public indebtedness. It is equally necessary that a rigid system of retrenchment and economy should be adopted in every branch of the public service, that the Government expenditures should be reduced to the minimum consistent with the interests of the country.

A sinking fund should also be provided for the gradual extinguishment of the principal of the debt, that the people may have some assurance that, though the process may be slow and the end remote, the yoke of this terrible burden may not press upon the necks of themselves and descendants forever; and yet the agents of the Government, the especial pets of Mr. Chase, appeal to the people for increased loans upon the distinct assertion that the national debt is a "national blessing." That public loans should be asked on such a plea as this is a marvel. The audacity of the proposition is without a parallel. In support of this reckless maxim the over-zealous agent refers his countrymen to the example of England. Instead of being an example of a national debt being a national blessing she has been the victim of a national debt. With vast advantage in geographical position, girt with oceans and channels, she has heretofore controlled the commerce of the world. With a sturdy and skillful population, with hills and mines of developed minerals, and a Government that has stood defiantly the slow evolution of a thousand years, yet her lands are monopolized by a population not exceeding thirty thousand in number. The great mass of the population of twenty-seven millions are but tenantry and operatives. Mr.

Gladstone, in May, 1864, declared in a speech in the British Parliament that less than one fiftieth part of the working men in England are in the enjoyment of the franchise.

The Chairman of the Ways and Means, and now of Appropriations, has boldly stated that the present taxes must be doubled or the debt repudiated.

A wise statesmanship, while encouraging, by adjusting oppressive taxes and inconsiderate restrictions upon our variegated industry, and developing our resources, agricultural as well as manufacturing, may yet lighten, in a very great degree, the burdens of the people; but to double the present tax will be more than the straw that breaks the camel's back. As a Representative of Pennsylvania—the greatest of the States in the material from which wealth is created and whose industry is largely engaged in manufactures—I confess to a just pride in her position. I am proud of her sturdy, intelligent, and enterprising population, and earnestly seek the promotion of all her great interests. We cannot, however, shut our eyes to the new condition of things which has been forced upon us by recent events and by the general progress of the world. Slavery having been extinguished in the South, she will demand more strenuously than ever the abolishment of commercial restrictions by the North. The West, an empire within herself, with a voice which it will be impossible to deny, will join in the same demand. It is therefore our policy to appreciate our natural advantages, and to moderate our demands to the realities which are before us. The recent experience of other countries appears to be decisive in favor of a liberal commerce. It was lately shown by Mr. Gladstone, the enlightened Chancellor of the English Exchequer, that a wonderful development of the commercial energies of that country has taken place since the relaxation of the Government restrictions. The masses of England, under the lead of Peel and Cobden, demanded cheap bread. The masses of this country demand cheap fabrics as well as cheap bread.

Similar financial and commercial prosperity have been presented in France by the policy, carefully modeled after the English system, which has been adopted since the accession of the present Emperor; her commercial development has outstripped the expectations of even the most sanguine; and while yielding a revenue greater than ever before, the people have been materially relieved of the burdens of taxation. Commerce, it must be remembered, has given life and prosperity to every nation to the exact extent in which each has enjoyed it. The ships of all civilized nations now meet, more than ever, in friendly rivalry upon every sea. The share of trade, however, which will fall to each nation will be determined by the natural resources, the development, and enlightened and liberal policy of each. England has grown preëminently great by her commerce. The commerce of India, probably the oldest of all countries in civilization, the most numerous in population, and the greatest in the value of its products for exchange, has enriched, successively, Tyre and Sidon and Alexandria, Byzantium and Carthage, and in modern times has poured its rich streams into Portugal, Holland and Venice, London and Paris and New York.

England, we shall not soon forget, sowed the seeds of our discontent, with the view of annihilating our republican example and our commercial importance. She pursued her object with such zeal and energy that slavery, the apple of discord, has disappeared from our political contests and left us a great and powerful nation. In the future our progress will be steady and advancing. New York is rapidly attracting to herself the importance of London, must soon become the great distributing commercial center of the world, and the British Government will yet be revolutionized by the force of our republican example.

Now that the rebellion has been suppressed, we are to look with careful solicitude that the genius of our Government is not changed in the operation. The growth of the war power, under the despotic plea of "necessity," had come to overshadow the liberty of the citizen to such an extent that we seemed rather the subjects of imperial sway than members of a democratic Republic, whose rights and privileges are defined and guaranteed by a written charter in the most solemn form known among men. But what avail written charters or established rights when they may be set aside by the stroke of a cabinet minister or a presidential pen? What is this but the exercise of the principle of imperialism? For that principle, as laid down by Justinian in his Institutes, is "Quod placuit principi habet legis vigorem," what pleases the prince has the force of law. If this kind of administration is sanctioned, our written charters will become obsolete. They will remain a dead letter in the volume of the fundamental law. They will have become outgrown and superseded by a new system of extra-constitutional practices. Our people have, therefore, to watch narrowly, that in conquering the South we have not conquered our liberties.

The constitutional provisions guarantying the liberties of the American citizen are those contained in the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the amendments. They secure him in the possession of personal liberty and property, against unwarrantable search and seizure, and in the right to a trial by jury. These are the American's birthright and the pillars which support our democratic government. They are of such transcendent importance that their violation is not to be tolerated for a moment, under whatever circumstances of popular excitement, or upon whatever pretext. In the night and storm of civil faction and ferment they are to the citizen what the constellations are to the mariner. However the tempest may rage, and the clouds obscure the face of the heavens, he knows that, so long as his guiding stars are visible, he is sure of his reckoning, and can steer safely for "the haven where he would be."

There are a few points which, if we are to remain a free people, must be understood by the humblest citizen. He should understand that the Constitution, and the laws made under it, are the only law of the land for all who have not voluntarily subjected themselves to another code. There is no other code except for the military and naval service, and, under certain circumstances, martial law.

Military law is the code established under the authority of the Constitution for the government of the land and naval forces; and martial law is that which is exercised by the commander of an army, in a state of war, over the territory which it occupies. It is the law of arbitrary discretion, of despotic power, and is, from the necessity of the case, the only law which can be exercised in conquered countries, in rebellious districts, in the camp, and in the field. Military law, administered upon its proper subjects, is a part of the law of the land. Where a party is properly subject to be tried by military or by martial law, the tribunal and mode of procedure are those known to those species of law respectively. In all other cases the Constitution declares that no person shall be held to answer for an infamous crime unless upon presentment of a grand jury, nor tried unless by a jury except in certain cases specified. This clause of the Constitution prevails at all times, and in all places, unless force or armed occupation set it aside, or unless the party to be tried has resigned his civil rights by becoming a soldier or a sailor.

The state of martial law is incident to the locality in which armed forces are present in conflict, or on the march, or in preparation for conflict; and the effect is the suspension of civil law in that locality. The mere existence of a state of war does not supersede the Constitution and civil law anywhere else. Wherever the civil courts are open, and justice regularly administered, the civil procedure is that alone which is applicable to any one charged with an infamous crime. The civil law cannot be superseded or suspended throughout the country—not even by the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, nor by Congress.

Another of the great palladia of liberty, the habeas corpus writ, was indeed authorized by Congress to be suspended by the President. But this did not change the common law in regard to illegal arrests. Whoever, holding whatever executive position, shall order the arrest of a citizen upon a general warrant—that is, a warrant not assigning the cause of arrest, and not upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation—is a trespasser; and no official character, and no imagined necessity, or expediency, can shield him from responsibility to the party injured.

The tendency to abuse, which ever attends the possession of power, was the very cause why the great personal guarantees of which I have spoken were placed in the Constitution. It is true—and I would that every citizen of the land were duly impressed with the fact—that the charter of our liberties is amply full and clear. But it is in vain that this is so, if we, for whose benefit it was intended, fail in the trying hour to insist on its observance. The existence of these abuses is furnishing the newest and strongest arguments to despotism. We seem to have forgotten the lessons of history—of that English history with which our fathers were so familiar. When they inserted those priceless provisions in the Constitution, they had a vivid memory of the glorious utterances of Magna Charta, sounding through centuries a voice to which every British descendant listens with an enchanted ear. They had a vivid memory of those engines of oppression which brought the head of Charles I to the block. I believe, sir, that at no time during the war has there been any occasion for a resort to instruments of that kind, and that the success of the war has not been in any measure due to their employment.

Whatever advantage, for a particular purpose, these methods may possess over the constitutional ones, they are against the spirit of our people and the nature of their institutions. It was, therefore, that the authors of our system made patriotic sacrifices for the sake of the greater good of preserving American freedom and manhood.

So great have been the changes in the working of our institutions under the late Administration, so strong the tendencies to imperialism, that they have been commented upon by English statesmen, and regarded as conclusive proof that our Republic has already faded away as a thing of the past, and that we are henceforth to be controlled by an absolute Government.

Now, sir, it will be the fault and folly of our people, if they permit the flagrant abuse of legitimate powers, which characterized the last Administration, to settle into established practice and permanent change of Government. Yet are the facts upon which I have commented sufficient to excite the deep concern of every one who loves his country and desires the perpetuity of her institutions.

The war between sections in this country having closed, let us hope forever, it is our part now to maintain our national traditions, and seek the unobscured fulfillment of our mission. There is greater unanimity, perhaps, upon no one subject among our people than upon that which claimed this continent for republicanism, free from European interposition. It needs no prophet to predict at no distant day voluntary aid to the Liberal cause from multitudes of disbanded soldiers, both Federal and confederate. This must bring the question of Maximilian's empire to a speedy solution, either by the abandonment by Napoleon of his support, and the retirement of the Austrian prince, or to a declaration of war by France to maintain his position.

Mr. Jefferson was the father of our policy of expansion. Ever since the publication of his views in 1803, and afterward in his letter to Mr. Monroe, it has been the end of Englishmen to baffle the object.

It is an undeniable fact that during the administration of Mr. Lincoln, in our diplomatic intercourse with foreign Powers, the American eagle has been made to bow his head and droop his plumes in humiliation and shame.

When the House of Representatives assumed the independence to reassert the Monroe doctrine, was not the full expression of congressional opinion upon the subject stifled in the Senate, and an apology forthwith sent to Louis Napoleon? Later still, when Mr. Lincoln was renominated at Baltimore, was not the nomination accepted by him, with the exclusion of the resolution affirming the Monroe doctrine? What is all this but a renunciation of the favorite policy of expansion?

But what is there in our history which makes the assertion of that principle less necessary now than at any former day? The Monroe doctrine declared that this continent must be secure for the free development of republican institutions without European interposition. This doctrine, so eminently reasonable and just, had been affirmed by our most prominent statesmen, without distinction of party, prior to 1861. Nor was there any imperative necessity for renouncing, or even waiving it; for the elements have all the time been in existence for checkmating the pretensions of England and France. These were to be found in the friendship of Russia and in the South American republics. Russia has long been the terror of western Europe; and a league of the republics of the western continent would have rendered French tenure of Mexico a thing of the past.

But the administration of Mr. Lincoln conceded the doctrine; and the incipient step toward crippling, and if events should favor, of annihilating, American democracy by the establishment of absolutism in Mexico, was permitted to become a Gallic success.

While such are the facts in regard to the Monroe doctrine, as presented by recent events, I am gratified to see that the President, true to his early teachings, has shown a determination to maintain the national dignity and our ancient policy.

It was not long since urged, with his peculiar force and eloquence, by M. Thiers, in the French Chambers, that it was unwise in France to favor the erection of a great independent Power on her own borders. He had allusion to the unification of Italy, but the remark has an application of strong significance for this country in reference to Mexico and Canada, which the Powers interested may do well to heed. The existence of a monarchy in Mexico on the south and of a monarchy in Canada upon the north, thus girdling and hampering our republican energies, is a restraint and a danger which cannot much longer be tolerated.

I adhere, Mr. Speaker, to the declaration which I have made here before, that the late terrible war could have been avoided. But a President had been elected upon a revolutionary platform; and the radical element in the North, stimulated by an unchristian trade or appeal from the pulpit, united with an unbridled and arrogant element from the South, did the work of desolation and death; and over the sad struggle the tears of humanity must continually flow. Perhaps it is charity to say that the bloody drama, in its progress and results, finds corresponding analogy in the storms of the physical world, which, with divine mystery, purify while scattering destruction and death.

The meddling of one-idea politicians with State institutions and property brought on the war; and now that it is concluded, they continue their agitations in the same mischievous spirit. In obedience to the teachings of the "higher-law" doctrines, they postpone all considerations to the realization of a legalized equality of races. Time was when the highest law which the good citizen could recognize involved obedience to the paramount law of his country. But with the class of politicians under notice that notion has long been discarded as an antiquated error.

It matters not that their principles were reputed by all statesmen of both parties in the country. It matters not that this Government was made by and for the white race; that the States reserved the right of making their local laws; and that the Union could not otherwise have been formed. It matters not that a million of lives have been sacrificed in the effort to reduce their pernicious theories to practice. Still they falter not in the contest; still they hug to their bosoms the phantom of negro equality; still they claim for one section the right to control the local affairs of others. They hold that the white and black race are equal. This they maintain involves and demands social equality; that negroes should be received on an equality in white families, should be admitted to the same tables at hotels, should be permitted to occupy the same seats in railroad cars and the same pews in churches; that they should be allowed to hold offices, to sit on juries, to vote, to be eligible to seats in the State and national Legislatures, and to be judges, or to make and expound laws for the government of white men. Their children are to attend the same schools with white children, and to sit side by side with them. Following close upon this will, of course, be marriages between the races, when, according to these philanthropic theorists, the prejudices of caste will at length have been overcome, and the negro, with the privilege of free miscegenation accorded him, will be in the enjoyment of his true status.

To future generations it will be a marvel in the history of our times, that a party whose tenets were such wild ravings and frightful dreams as these should be permitted, in their support, to urge the country into the hugest and most destructive of civil wars, and should, when war was inaugurated, be permitted to shape its policy in furtherance of their peculiar ends. For the full realization of their plans, they are ready to sacrifice not only our priceless system of government, but even our social superiority itself.

We have to remember, on the other hand, that negro equality does not exist in nature. The African is without a history. He has never shown himself capable of self-government by the creation of a single independent State possessing the attributes which challenge the respect of others. The past is silent of any negro people who possessed military and civil organization, who cultivated the arts at home, or conducted a regular commerce with their neighbors. No African general has marched south of the desert, from the waters of the Nile to the Niger and Senegal, to unite by conquest the scattered territories of barbarous tribes into one great and homogeneous kingdom. No Moses, Solon, Lycurgus, or Alfred, has left them a code of wise and salutary laws. They have had no builder of cities; they have no representatives in the arts, in science, or in literature; they have been without even a monument, an alphabet, or a hieroglyphic.

Civilization among the whites has, indeed, been a thing of progress; but that progress has been steady and sure. When Julius Cæsar landed in Britain he found the Britons savages, painted warriors. Four hundred years after, Hengist and Horsa made a lodgment upon the island, and their Saxon followers laid the foundation of English civilization. And let it be remembered that this was by no means the commencement of civilization. Before this, Cicero, in the midst of an intelligence transmitted from northern Africa to Greece, and from Greece to Rome, had electrified the Roman Senate with his eloquence and Cato had dignified it with his justice. Long before this Plato had taught his divine philosophy, and Homer had published his immortal song, in that immortal language, too, in which St. Paul gave his religion to the world. The African was yet not so far away in his Libyan home but he might have heard the clinking of the hammers upon the walls of Alexandria, as they rose in architectural beauty and commercial grandeur at the mouth of the Nile, or of Thebes, with her hundred gates, higher up. He might have heard of the pyramids, those vast structures which have excited the wonder of the centuries which have rolled over them since their erection by the Ptolemies. But the negro is to this day, in Africa, a savage and a cannibal.

It is impossible that two distinct races should exist harmoniously in the same country, on the same footing of equality by the law. The result must be a disgusting and deteriorating admixture of races, such as is presented in the Spanish States of America by the crossing of the Castilian with the Aztec and the negro. The prejudice of color is one of those facts implanted by Providence for wise purposes. Among others it is doubtless for the purpose of preserving a race homogeneous, which is the source of its true strength and permanent improvement. Physiologists instruct us that a race may be improved by the union of valuable qualities among the same race or others of similar characteristics, but not by the indiscriminate amalgamation of superior with greatly inferior races. It is the homogeneous races which have controlled the world. The Jew, though without a country and everywhere the object of prejudice, yet maintains his physical and mental excellence even to the present day; and it is because he intermarries chiefly with his own race. The Anglo-Saxon, the dominant and most advanced in civilization upon the globe, owes its superiority to its homogeneity or alliance with others of kindred excellence.

We have, then, to insist upon it that this Government was made for the white race. It is our mission to maintain it. Negro suffrage and equality are incompatible with that mission. We must make our own laws and shape our own destiny. Negro suffrage will, in its tendency, force down the Anglo-Saxon to the negro level, and result inevitably in amalgamation and deterioration of our race. The proud spirit of our people will revolt at such certain degradation, while American women, the models of beauty and superiority, will indignantly execrate the men who advise and dictate the policy.

The pictures of negro suffering in the South, as a consequence of the disorganization of society, are calculated to touch the hearts of all not utterly callous to human affliction. These cannot be fairly charged upon the former masters of the blacks, because the latter are mostly as destitute, save in the naked proprietorship of the soil, as their former slaves. The condition of the southern negro is indeed such as strongly to appeal to our sympathies. What, with deep concern we may inquire, is to become of him? It is certain that no scheme of philanthropy can be considered successful, or even justifiable, that, under pretense of bettering the condition of a race, removes the same from a competence to a state of destitution and death.

It requires no great prescience to predict what, as a result of the destruction of the labor system of the South, must be the fate of the negro. This is already foreshadowed in certain facts gathered from the statistics of northern cities. It thus appears that, with every advantage of procuring a livelihood possessed by the white inhabitants of New York and Boston, and with laws which, in the sense of his peculiar friends, eminently favor him, his numbers have not increased in those localities, but show a remarkable diminution. It is also a fact equally well established, that the mortality among this people in the South during the war has been beyond example, even in those districts from which slavery has been expelled by the advance of our armies. Thus it is demonstrated that when left to their own control the colored population lack the qualities requisite to a provision for their own subsistence and the raising of families. The history of San Domingo and Jamaica, after their emancipation, teaches a fruitful yet melancholy lesson of this truth. Thus the doom of the negro is written with that of the American Indian, in rapid and sure extinction; and when the future historian shall inquire into the cause of his decay, and shall find it in the misguided efforts of his friends, he will ask the significant question, whether it would not have been true benevolence to permit him to continue to live under a gradual emancipation than not to live at all.

The southern people as a result of the war have lost their property in slaves. Their rights as political communities are, however, in other respects unimpaired. They are entitled to continue State governments—have the exclusive right to determine what classes of their population shall be entitled to vote, and their Representatives have the same right as others to seats upon this floor. Their admission as such cannot rightfully be denied them.

Mr. Lincoln, in April, 1861, and afterward in February, 1863, speaking through Mr. Seward, the present as well as the then Secretary of State, to the Government of France and to the world, declared:

"That there is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail, for the rights of the States and the condition of every human being in them will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration, whether the revolution shall succeed or fail. In the one case the States would be federally connected with the new confederacy, in the other they would as now be members of the United States; but their constitutions and laws, customs, habits, and institutions in either will remain the same."

* * "That the Congress of the United States furnishes a constitutional forum for debates between the alienated parties. Senators and Representatives from the loyal portion of the people are there already, fully empowered to confer, and seats also are vacant and inviting Senators and Representatives of the discontented party who may be constitutionally sent there from the States involved in the insurrection."

President Johnson in his message maintains without reserve that—

"The amendment to the Constitution being adopted, it would remain for the States whose powers have been so long in abeyance to resume their places in the two branches of the national Legislature, and thereby complete the work of restoration."

The Democracy stand by the President in his effort to "complete the work of restoration," and congratulate the country that there is a firm, strong hand upon the helm, and a clear eye which looks out upon the darkness, and which no order of any caucus can turn from the polar star that guides his course.

We have subdued the rebel armies which were the first obstacle to the restoration of the Union. But the work is not done. It is natural that disaffection should exist to some extent in the southern mind to the Government of the victors. Unless by timely clemency and the liberal pardon of offenders with a general amnesty at an early day this feeling can be eradicated, the Union will be but nominal, and can only be maintained by standing armies and garrisoned towns. That apparatus, the privation of personal liberty and the rights of full citizenship, which are so offensive to freemen, and which have distinguished Russia, Austria, and Venice, will have to be maintained, and if maintained for any great length of time will pass by easy transition into imperialism and over the whole land.

Mr. Speaker, I have but a word to add concerning the relation of the General Government to the States, and of the States to one another. I have listened with respect and attention to the principles of international law as they have been discussed with rare ability by the distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the House, but I think they have failed to prove out of Grotius and Vattel and Puffendorf that America has no laws, no Constitution, and no Union among her great sisterhood of States. We must not forget that we are considering a question purely of internal administration, which must be settled solely by the municipal laws of our own country, and not by the laws of nations. The question before us is, what are the rights and obligations of our own citizens toward their own Government in time of peace? and not, what are the relative duties of two foreign countries in time of open and flagrant war? The law of nations takes no cognizance of that which is done in time of peace by a single Government with its own people.

It is true that where a people divide, and the parties become hostile to one another and take up arms and thus make a civil war, the common humanity of the world will insist that the contest between them, as long as it continues to be a military contest, shall be carried on according to the rules and principles which apply to separate belligerent nations.

I maintain that when the rebellion was suppressed the law resumed its authority. The law was suspended during the rebellion because it could not be executed; but it was not repealed, destroyed, or abolished. If the sovereign whose power has been opposed by an insurgent force is an absolute despot, he may wreak his vengeance at will, as Russia did upon Poland and Austria upon Hungary. If he is a limited monarch, he must govern after a rebellion as he did before, according to the laws of the realm. If the armed opposition was made against a constitutional republic, it is absurd to say that the officers or legislators of the Government have acquired from the rebellion a power which the constitution did not give them. It is equally absurd to say that the laws were abolished by the very war which was waged for their preservation. We must remember that this Government has not been revolutionized by the southern rebellion, and I deny that it has added one particle to the power of any man who holds office under the United States.

I believe most devoutly in the Constitution framed by the fathers of the Republic, and in that Union which was the result of the Constitution. I have no faith in any other mode of bringing the States together. We must still look to that Constitution and the laws for a justification of all we do, and every citizen may still plead that he owes no obedience to mere arbitrary power because there is no arbitrary power in existence.

I happen to represent a region of country which was once in rebellion against the United States. The insurrection was put down by superior military force. In those days, under the lead of Washington and Hamilton, the monstrous doctrine that as a conquered people they and their children had no rights under the Constitution was never thought of. They submitted to the law and the law protected them.

The people of the South have submitted to the authority and Government of the United States. What is that Government? The Constitution and laws. But our radical friends say their submission was made to the will of the dominant party in this House and the Senate.

Did secession destroy the Union? Certainly not, for secession was a nullity. Did the war which we carried on to enforce the laws destroy the obligation of the laws? A secessionist might say so, but in the eyes of a Union man there can be nothing more absurd or disloyal. Where, then, is the authority to govern without law? It will not be pretended that there is a divine right. We must come back, then, to the fundamental law, which is the true source of all power, and the true standard of duty for all the people who are under our jurisdiction.

The committee on reconstruction has proposed an amendment to the Constitution excluding from the basis of representation all persons denied the franchise on account of race or color. This proposition strikes at the Constitution in its most vital particular, and has many advocates without much consideration. The whole question of representation was settled by our fathers with great difficulty, after a most careful and matured deliberation. It is unwise to disturb it. The policy of amendment once introduced will not stop with curtailing the representation of the southern States. Under the Constitution all legislative powers consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, the legislative powers of the Senate being equal to that of the House. In addition to this the Senate is a part of the treaty-making and appointing power. If it is intended that representation shall be based upon numbers, then we must remodel that part of the Constitution which gives to New England and several of the new States a voice so largely disproportionate to their population. The six New England States, with a population less than New York, and but little greater than Pennsylvania, have twelve Senators, while each of the latter have but two. With this disproportionate power New England has shaped the policy of the Government to her own advantage, in the navigation laws, in the fisheries, and in the protective policy. The great agricultural interests of the country, and especially of those States situate in the valley of the Mississippi and around the Gulf of Mexico, have been tolled by her for more than fifty years. The instincts of empire stimulated by the example of amendment will arouse this interest to circumscribe a power so full of exaction and prohibition. Such reform would readily commend itself to the judgment as well as the passions of men, and soon become an element of party warfare. Be careful, then, how you lay the hand of innovation on this part of the Constitution.

The idea of a certain class of politicians, of confiscating the lands of the South and parceling them out among negroes and adventurers, has for its object the extermination of the present generation of southern whites, and shows the barbarous animus of that most impracticable party. They would adopt that same policy of irritation which was attempted by Elizabeth and James in Ireland, and which has been fruitful only of heart-burning and discontent to the present hour.

It is not the policy of the Government to keep it pressed upon the minds of the South that they are subject to a galling yoke. Neither is it right. The people of the South when they have once given in their adhesion to the Government are as much freemen, as much entitled to protection in the rights of self-government, as any portion of the North. There is a broad distinction between power and right, and while the Government possesses the power she should exercise it in subordination to those great principles of democracy and republicanism which constitute the basis of our system. It is a plain violation of these to force upon the South any modification of her social condition, any political status not sanctioned by her people through their law-making assemblies.

Such a policy may drive a people to despair, may prepare the fuel for lighting anew the flames of insurrection; but will never generate love for the Government which thus seeks to oppress them. True statesmanship will not attempt to succeed by such means. A strict regard for justice, abatement of extreme pretensions; a steady effort to show the South that the war was not waged out of hatred to her people, but only for the preservation of the national territory unfractured; a careful regard for her interests in common with those of the other States, these, I believe, are the only means which will ever succeed in obliterating the silent but corroding memories of errors, wrongs, and sufferings; of offacing the deep scars of civil bloodshed and warming the estranged hearts of our countrymen toward a common Government once more. The expressed desire of the South, if conquered, to belong to a strong Government, and her readiness to resent the imagined injury inflicted upon her by the neutrality of the European Powers, should be wisely taken advantage of to revive and rivet the Union feeling.

We ask indemnity from England for the ravages of anglo-rebel cruisers. We protest against the establishment of a monarchy on the ruins of the Mexican republic, and we are anxious to preserve the national faith and lessen the evils of a redundant currency. A cordial reunion of the States will do more to settle our foreign complications than "an army with banners." It would stimulate a revival of our industrial pursuits and divert into new channels a portion of our paper issues. It would encourage a speedy and active cultivation of the lands of the South, add largely to the public revenue, and increase the basis of security for the payment of the public debt. Who can hesitate to coöperate for such a purpose—to restore the Union, to reunite a people, to reestablish an empire of free Commonwealths, and make it irresistible and imperishable? And yet the caucus of the dominant party originated the joint resolution and the committee of fifteen, to which is committed without debate whatever relates immediately or remotely to the restoration of the Union. A policy thus struck out in advance of the message has forestalled the action of Congress and virtually notified the President that the "information of the state of the Union" which the Constitution requires him to give is immaterial and disregarded. It presumed the States in which insurrection lately prevailed to be no States, and, as a consequence, that all his acts looking to their restoration were simple usurpations.

In the rise and progress of this war we have seen a frightful display of the wild and reckless passions of our nature, manifesting itself in proscription, confiscation, and an utter disregard of the rights of person and property, of freedom of speech and publication, and of trial by jury. If we look back to the instructive records of that Commonwealth which was the greatest which preceded our own, we find that when once a faction which dominated resorted to proscription and the gratification of malignant passion this was the natural excuse for the opposite faction, on succeeding to power, of retaliating the same abuses. Sylla was the leader in this sanguinary policy. Then it was freely resorted to by Marius and by Cinna. Even Cicero, with all his high-toned principles, descended to this abuse in the punishment, without law, of the Catilinian conspirators. A reaction was the natural consequence. The infliction of punishment contrary to law excited a sympathy with the vicious, and Cicero himself was soon a sufferer by the same code. The event proved the wisdom of Julius Cæsar, who in the Senate counseled moderation as at all times the true policy. It does not detract from the value of Cæsar's counsel that he was himself assassinated in turn—for corruption had become too general and deep seated to admit of any but a forcible remedy—and that through such a horrible highway of blood the republic became merged in the empire. May we not ask, do these extra-constitutional and unlawful acts upon the part of our rulers mark the steps of a like progress on our part toward the repose of absolutism?

Would it not be far better in this condition of things to repeal this sweeping and revolutionary confiscation law? For, what is the end and object of that act? If it is a punishment, then I am fortified by the opinion of Montesquieu, that all such punishments are unwise. The following is the language which he uses in his Spirit of Laws:

"As soon as a republic has compassed the destruction of those who wanted to subvert it, there should be an end of examples, punishments, and even of rewards."

"Great punishments, and consequently great changes, cannot take place without investing some citizens with too great a power. It is therefore more advisable in this case to exceed in lenity than in severity; to banish but few rather than many; and to leave them their estates rather than to make a great number of confiscations. Under pretense of revenging the republic's cause, the avengers would establish tyranny. The business is not to destroy the rebel, but the rebellion. They ought to return as quick as possible into the usual track of government, in which every one is protected by the laws, and no one oppressed."

We must remember that in the struggle through which we have passed a million of our people have been slain, and among others the Washingtons, Marshalls, and Monroes; and that Virginia has been desolated and dismembered. It was this same Virginia that, in the struggle of 1776, marched to the relief of Massachusetts. In that eventful conflict she was to Massachusetts as the shield of Achilles to the Greeks. She furnished the author of the Declaration and the leader of the continental army which carried the Revolution to success, and afterward the statesmen who laid the foundation of the Government.

The Republican party has accomplished its mission, which was the abolition of slavery. For the rest there is no longer any bond of union among its members. The numerous propositions to amend the Constitution are but the signals of distress, while the despairing cry is heard from every portal. The Democracy have no changes to make. Their principles are identical with the prosperity of the country, and are as perpetual as the Government itself. They have only to adhere to those principles; in the breadth and vigor with which they were thus announced in Mr. Jefferson's inaugural:

"Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none; the support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrators of our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; a jealous care of the rights of election by the people, a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution, when peaceable remedies are unprovided; absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, the vital principle of republics, from which is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism; a well-disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts, and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information, and arraignment of all abuses at the bar of the public reason; freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of person, under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected."

These, Mr. Speaker, are the immutable principles of eternal justice, and must be recognized as the governing law of our race. The disorganization of society induced by the late struggle, and the demoralizing spirit of plunder which is abroad in the land, may for a time retard their adoption, but their full and general recognition cannot long be delayed. In the language of Henry Clay, "truth is inevitable and public justice certain."

In restoring to order the scattered parts of a Government and people returning to peace after a terrible civil war, the principles of justice must be preserved. With a just sense of right, and with comprehensive view, we must not only forget the past, but we must, by an equal distribution of the benefits as well as the burdens of Government, make it the interest of all sections to uphold and defend it. Such interest is the great regulating principle, the true bond of Union; the cohesive power that holds Governments together, and makes a nation truly great and prosperous. For a time the southern States may be denied the privileges of a reunion, and of a representation on this floor; the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended; arbitrary arrests may be renewed; military commissions continued; and the cry of an unbridled fanaticism heard over the voice of struggling justice; but so certainly as the waters find their level, or the magnet points to the pole, will that spirit of liberty and independence which the Almighty blew into our nostrils with the breath of life conduct our principles to final triumph.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to urge a few objections to the bill now before us, which I deem pertinent, and which I think should have some influence in the final action of this House. It is a measure intended to affect specially and beneficially a large number of our people, and will, in its operations, concern and affect immediately and remotely the whole community. Before proceeding further, I will here state that my remarks will be upon the bill as it came from the Senate. A few amendments have been reported by the committee which do not materially change any of its features, or involve any principle in it, but have reference mainly to detail.

In opposing this bill, I want it distinctly understood that it is not because I think the General Government should not, and ought not, to render a certain amount of aid and assistance to the unfortunate class which the friends of this bill propose to render. It is because, to my mind, the object attempted to be reached is sought for in a most extravagant and loose way, and because I think the same result can be attained with as much certainty, and be as effective in a more direct and economical manner. That this helpless class of persons need, for a time at least, the sure and protecting aid of the General Government, and not be left to the ill-advised and fitful efforts of the well-intentioned benevolence of individuals, no one, it seems to me, can for a moment doubt.

At the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress a bill was passed creating the present Freedmen's Bureau. At that time the military, to whom were intrusted the care and protection of the freedmen, were so actively engaged in their operations in the field that but little time could be devoted to the interest of the freedmen; hence a necessity arose for the bureau.

But a great change has taken place since that time. Peace now, through the well-directed efforts of our able and patriotic leaders, pervades the whole land, and the military is now in a condition to assume the charge which it was advisable a year ago to relieve it from.

My first objection to this bill is, that it proposes to enlarge the powers of the bureau, and to extend the theater of its operations; and why these increased powers I am at a loss to understand.

In neither the reports of General Grant nor General Howard do I find that it is asked; and the impression made upon my mind from a careful reading of those able reports was that if any further legislation were needed on this subject it should have been to contract its powers, and not to increase them.

The first section of this bill proposes to extend the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Freedmen in all parts of the United States, which is to be interpreted to mean, as I take it from what follows, that the President may divide the whole United States into twelve districts, and appoint assistant commissioners for such districts, and agents in every county and parish in the country.

The explanation which will be given to this provision by the friends of this measure I suppose will be that it was necessary to make the act general, that the operations of the bureau might be extended into the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, or parts of them. If that be the explanation, why not limit the operations of the bureau to the eleven rebellious States and the States named? I do not suppose that it will be claimed that there is a necessity for extending the operations of the bureau beyond the States which I have named, nor do I suppose that it is so intended; yet at the discretion of the President, in addition to the Commissioners and assistant commissioners, two thousand and sixty-four agents and four thousand one hundred and twenty-eight clerks, may be appointed at an expense of $8,046,600 to the Government. Such a thing I can hardly think is contemplated at this time, nor can I believe that it would be permitted by the present Executive.

But as the bureau is continued indefinitely, or until otherwise provided by law, an unscrupulous President, for party purposes, has it in his power at any time to pension on the Government this large number of persons at the expense of the nation.

This, Mr. Speaker, whatever others may think of it, I denominate loose legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this act discriminates and favors one class at the expense of another; or in other words, its benefits and immunities are special, and not general.

The Freedmen's Bureau was established ostensibly for the aid and protection of refugees and freedmen. At the time the bureau was created there was a large class of refugees, or persons, both white and black, who were very properly denominated refugees; persons who had escaped and broke through the enemy's lines into our own for safety. But now, since the war has ceased, the term "refugees" ceases to describe any class of persons among us. That class of persons which the word refugees was descriptive of have now returned to their homes; and the great change wrought by the termination of the war in the circumstances and condition of that class of persons leaves the name refugee without a meaning, as in its original application, therefore obsolete and inapplicable in describing any class of persons now having a habitation within the United States.

Now, according to my understanding of the meaning of the name refugee as it is used in the bill creating the bureau and the bill now before us, the present proposed legislation is solely and entirely for the freedmen, and to the exclusion of all other persons, whether white or black, be their circumstances what they may.

This, sir, is what I call class legislation—legislation for a particular class of the blacks to the exclusion of all whites, and all blacks who in being deprived of the benefits and immunities extended by this bill will have cause to think it a misfortune to have been free.

Such partial legislation, Mr. Speaker, cannot be lasting; it seems to me to be in opposition to the plain spirit pervading nearly every section of the Constitution that congressional legislation should in its operation affect all alike.

No special and discriminating legislation that I am aware of has yet in this Republic stood the test of time, nor do I believe that it ought or will; and I warn the gentlemen in their zeal to elevate and ameliorate the condition of the freedmen not to allow this bill to pass regardless of the great principle, equality before the law, about which so much has been said during the past four years.

In my opinion if they do, the aid which they will render can only be temporary and not permanent, and in the reaction which is sure to follow, the injury and harm which will fall upon the head of the poor black will be greater than the present and temporary good afforded.

It is said that it is a characteristic of zealots and fanatics to carry things to extremes. Many persons in our community have been proclaiming equality before the law so long, taking their text from the institution of slavery, that now there is an opportunity to establish so desirable a principle in our Government, that perhaps it would be well to stop and consider whether or not by passing this bill in its present shape we shall not overlap the mark and land on the other side, and before we are aware of it, not have the freedmen equal before the law, but superior.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this idea is worthy of some consideration, and I commend it to those who are really desirous of benefiting the freedmen permanently and substantially.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the cost of this bureau for one year. In doing so I will first show what it might cost if the President should in his discretion use to the full limit the authority and power given him by the provisions of this bill.

The bill provides in its first section that the President may divide the section of country containing refugees and freedmen into districts, each containing one or more States, not to exceed twelve in number. Under this wide and comprehensive discretion I see no difficulty in the way of the President dividing the whole United States into twelve districts.

Again, in the second section it is provided:

That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, may divide each district into a number of sub-districts not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in such district, and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent, who shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,500; and each agent of a sub-district may employ two clerks of the first class.

Now, supposing the President should, in the exercise of his discretion given to him by this bill, appoint all the officers that the bill will allow him to appoint and from civil life, the following will show the cost to which the Government would be subjected:

Salary of Commissioner for one year.....	$3,000

Now, sir, there have been about three million five hundred thousand slaves liberated by the amendment to the Constitution; say that one tenth of the whole number, which I think a small estimate, should require aid in the way of clothing, food, medicines, and transportation, at a cost of fifty dollars per head.

This would increase the expense.....	$17,500,000
Add to this the estimate of General Howard for the following expenditures for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1866:
For stationery and printing.....	63,000
For quarters and fuel.....	15,000
For school superintendents.....	21,000
Sites for school-houses and asylums.....	3,000,000
Telegraphing.....	18,000

And we have a grand total of..... $8,807,000

I have no idea that it is contemplated for a moment to extend the operations of the bureau over the whole United States, but think I have shown conclusively that it might be so extended.

I can see no necessity for such an unlimited discretion, and when there is no necessity beyond that which is required to accomplish and carry out the object sought for, it seems to me that it would be wise to withhold it.

But to show the cost or proximate cost of the bureau for one year, confining its operations to the hitherto slave States, we have only to deduct from the above grand total the salaries of agents and their clerks in the nineteen free States, $3,455,400, and the cost will be $25,351,600. That it is intended to put the bureau in full operation in every county and parish of the hitherto slave States, including Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, I have not the least doubt, nor have I any doubt but that it is intended to extend it into parts of some of the border States.

Now, sir, I do not think that I can be charged with having over-estimated the expense of the bureau; on the contrary, I have rather under than over-estimated its cost, and have left out of the calculation many costly items which, upon a closer analysis, will be found incident to a full development of the plan of the Freedmen's Bureau:

Section-four provides:

That the President is authorized to reserve from sale or from settlement, under the homestead and pre-emption laws, and to set apart for the use of freedmen and loyal refugees, male or female, unoccupied public lands in Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, not exceeding in all three million acres of good land.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know the necessity of setting apart three million acres of land for the exclusive use of the freedmen in the particular States named.

We have in the southern States about thirty million acres of unoccupied public lands. Why not then, Mr. Speaker, throw these public lands open to all loyal citizens, under the pre-emption and homestead laws, and if necessary to restrict the quantity to forty acres, do so? And if the freedmen or any other loyal citizen desire to become freeholders, give them the opportunity; and if the costs of entering such lands be too much, which I believe is ten dollars, then reduce it, or make no charge at all. I believe that it would be to the pecuniary advantage of the Government to give these lands to parties who would reclaim and improve them rather than they should remain unoccupied and a waste.

I believe that it is the true policy of the Government to encourage emigration to the southern States and the speedy settlement of these lands. Their enhanced value by improvement would give to the Government a revenue from taxation in a very short time more than sufficient to pay their first cost and the expense of bringing them into market.

This plan, it seems to me, would be more equitable and less objectionable, on the ground of special legislation, than that suggested by the bill. It certainly would afford all who were disposed to avail themselves of the liberal provisions of the homestead act—a home by taking the trouble to enter the land and expending the labor necessary to comply with the requirements of the act.

Again, section six provides:

That the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, is hereby empowered to purchase or rent such tracts of land in the several districts aforesaid as may be necessary to provide for the indigent refugees and freedmen dependent upon the Government for support.

This provision, Mr. Speaker, is too plain to need comment. Section four provides for the setting apart three million acres of land for the freedmen, yet the framers of this bill, seemingly in doubt as to whether three million acres will be sufficient, ask that the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, may purchase, without limit other than his own judgment, additional land. I do not know how this proposition will strike others, but to my mind it seems singular that the Government, being in possession of from twenty-five to thirty million acres of unoccupied lands in the southern States, should be asked, without limit as to quantity or value, to purchase additional lands.

What additional expense the Government will be put to in the purchase or renting of lands will be left entirely to the Commissioner, and what that may be is a matter of speculation. But judging from the appropriation which he asks for the purchase of sites for school-houses and asylums, $3,000,000, one might reasonably suppose that it would be a pretty large sum.

Section five provides for the confirming of the possession of the freedmen for three years in the occupancy of the lands upon which they were settled pursuant to General Sherman's special order, dated January 16, 1865.

That General Sherman had a right to settle the freedmen on these abandoned lands at the time he did so I have no doubt. They were held by military power, and the laws of war justified him in setting them apart for the safety of those who claimed and were entitled to his protection. His authority being one originating out of the condition of things occasioned by a state of war, in my judgment ceased after its termination, and the control which he assumed over civil affairs, and which he was justified in assuming during the war, lapsed back to the legally constituted civil authorities at its close.

It seems to me a monstrosity, that a Government which is instituted for the protection of persons in the possession and enjoyment of their property should be despoiled of it, and that it should be given to others without the slightest consideration. Neither municipal nor international law will justify such an assumption, and to my mind such legislation can only lead to vexatious litigation, and with but one end—a judicial decision that the law is unconstitutional and of no effect.

And I submit whether or not it would not be wise in Congress to remove the freedmen to some of the unoccupied lands, where they would have an undisputed title to their homesteads, and prove in the end to be to their very best interest.

Having shown what seems to me objectionable features in this bill, I submit to this House whether the end which it aims to accomplish cannot be obtained just as surely, and with as great a degree of certainty, in another way, and with a great saving to the Treasury.

General Grant, in his report of December 18, says in substance that it will be necessary to keep garrisons in the States lately in rebellion until such time as labor returns to its proper channels and civil authority is fully established. That being the case, why cannot the aid and protection rendered through the Freedmen's Bureau be rendered through this channel? As it is, the bureau depends entirely upon the military to make its authority effective.

A well-established military garrison has all the appliances at hand to aid the destitute freedmen, women, and children, and the force to protect them. What more is needed? The foregoing conforms with General Grant's view, that there is no necessity of the expense of a separate organization. He says, in concluding the report before alluded to, that—

"The Freedmen's Bureau being separated from the military establishment of the country requires all the expense of a separate organization. One does not necessarily know what the other is doing, or what orders they are acting under. It seems to me that this could be corrected by regarding every officer on duty with troops in the southern States as an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, and then have all orders from the head of the bureau sent through department commanders. This would create a responsibility that would secure uniformity of action throughout all the South, would insure the orders and instructions from the head of the bureau being carried out, and would relieve from duty and pay a large number of employees of the Government."

This to my mind is conclusive that the Freedmen's Bureau, with its elaborate and expensive organization, is not needed; that all that can be done for the freedmen by that institution can be done through the military garrisons that are now established throughout the South with equal certainty and effect, and a saving to the Government of millions of dollars.

I desire to call the attention of the House to a remark contained on page 13 of General Howard's report. He says:

"My objection to the system I have been obliged to adopt has been its tendency to check individuality, not sufficiently encouraging self-dependency."

This is truly a grave and serious objection, and one that should engage the attention of the friends of the freedmen. Too much can be done as well as not enough. By doing too much you prolong his dependence and encourage idleness; and when you withdraw the aid and support of the Government you will leave him in a worse condition than when you found him.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I have criticised what I conceive to be imperfections in this bill with no unfriendly feeling toward the freedmen. I think they need and should have the fostering care of the Government to a reasonable extent, and that I think they can have and should have through the military, and the Government be relieved from the expense and cost of sustaining two organizations to perform the office which one can as effectually and thoroughly perform as the two.

Mr. DONNELLY obtained the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announcing that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 25) tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay on the 5th August, 1864; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

PILOTS IN GOVERNMENT EMPLOY.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] will give me the floor a few moments before he commences his remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. If it does not come out of my time I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, on the 16th day of December last I had the honor to submit the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, when appointed, be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of providing by law that all pilots engaged in the gunboat or other naval service of the Government during the late war, shall be deemed to have been officers within the terms of the rules and regulations of the service on that subject, and entitled to the same extra pay and rations as other officers in the same service whose monthly compensation was the same; and that the said committee report by bill or otherwise.

On the 18th instant that committee, by Mr. DARLING, submitted the following report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

That any further or new legislation on the subject is inexpedient.

The committee find on investigation that a very large proportion of the persons intended to be benefited by further legislation were, and are now, living in the States lately in rebellion, were prior to the late war engaged in piloting vessels in the civil service in those States, and were in many instances forced into the service of piloting the war vessels of the United States against their wishes, although they were generally out of employment. The committee also find that it is not just or expedient to class such persons with those officers of the Navy who volunteered their services in behalf of the Government, and they submit that if there are any exceptions to the rule above stated, such cases can only be reached by special legislation.

The committee also find that all persons employed in the service specified in the resolution have been as well paid by the Government as they were before or have been since in the civil service; and that so far from having been injuriously affected by the war, their business was generally increased, and in many instances they have been materially benefited.

My present purpose is to ask the favor of the House to take that resolution and report from the table, and commit them to the Committee on Military Affairs for further consideration. And before the motion is put, I beg the indulgence of the House while I submit a few remarks explanatory of my reason for making it.

I will not for a moment believe that the Committee on Naval Affairs would intentionally do the slightest injustice to the class of persons referred to in my resolution. But their report must have been made upon an entire misapprehension of facts, for, in my judgment, it does very great injustice to the class named, besides denying to them what I conceive to be an obvious right.

The Navy Department, some time in July, 1865, in reference to the gunboat service on our western rivers, directed that officers should be allowed one month's leave for each year of service, and it was the expectation of the pilots engaged in that service that they would be treated as officers, and receive the benefit of the same leave. But the law was otherwise construed by the Secretary of the Navy, and I do not now question the legal propriety of that decision. The pilots, however, appeal to the Government to be placed upon as favorable a footing in that one respect as other officers in the same service.

The kind of service rendered by them was fully as onerous, important, and responsible as that performed by any officers of subordinate ranks in the western naval service. Their capacity to render that service with efficiency and safety to the Government was the result of long years of patient labor and observation. It was not acquired in a day, and in the conduct of the vast commerce of the western rivers, piloting is justly esteemed a calling of great importance and respectability. It will surely not be pretended that they were subjected to any less danger in the discharge of their important duties than the officers of the boats they were piloting. They were exposed, in a greater degree, than any officer of the boats to the deadly aim of the rebel sharpshooters who infested the banks of the rivers they were piloting. They were liable at almost any moment to become the victims of unseen enemies. Their positions denied them the ability or right to guard their own safety, and compelled them to be mindful only of the security of their vessels against the dangers of the rivers, and often under circumstances demanding the very highest degree of self-possession and bravery.

They received for their services $250 per month, and rations worth thirty cents per day. It cost them but little if any less than one dollar per day to live. In the merchant service, I am informed by several pilots of the highest credibility, they could at the same time have gotten from $500 to $750 per month, with boarding. These facts alone sufficiently explain any reluctance that any of them may have manifested to leaving the merchant service for the naval service. But a large majority of them entered the latter service voluntarily, and continued in it until the close of the war. They will certainly learn with surprise, "that so far from having been injuriously affected by the war, their business was generally increased, and in many instances they have been materially benefited."

But I should not have felt disposed to ask any further attention to this subject now if it were not made my duty to do so by the reflection which is contained in the report of the committee against the loyalty and patriotism of the pilots. I respectfully but earnestly protest that the remarks of the committee do them great wrong in these particulars. If they have any foundation in fact to sustain them, they must rest upon the merest individual instances, and certainly do not justify reflections affecting so injuriously a whole class. So far as I know the pilots to be benefited by the desired legislation in this case, not one of them resides in a State lately in rebellion. And as to the pilots as a class, I esteem it alike a pleasure and a duty to assure the House, upon my general knowledge of their character, derived from a long residence near the falls of the Ohio river, that there cannot be found in the country any class of men more unequivocally loyal, patriotic, and gallant in their fidelity to our country and Government. As a fitting and somewhat authoritative answer to these reflections of the honorable committee, I ask attention to the opinion of Rear Admiral David D. Porter, as I read it from the report of that officer to the Secretary of the Navy, under date of April 14, 1864, at page 522 of Message and Documents, Navy Department, 1864-65:

"There is a class of men who have during this war shown a good deal of bravery and patriotism, and who have seldom met with any notice from those whose duty it is to report such matters. I speak of the pilots on the western waters. Without any hope of future reward, through fame or in a pecuniary way, they enter into the business of piloting the transports through dangers that would make a faint-hearted man quail. Occupying the most exposed positions, a fair mark for a sharpshooter, they are continually fired at, and often hit, without so much as a mention being made of their gallantry. On this expedition they have been much exposed, and have shown great gallantry in managing their vessels while under fire in this, to them, unknown river. I beg leave to pay this small tribute to their bravery and zeal, and I must say, as a class, I never knew a braver set of men."

This report was written upon the flag-ship Cricket, Mississippi squadron, off Grand Ecure, Louisiana.

I now move the reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection being made, leave was granted, and the report was taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONTESTED SEAT.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of privilege. I ask that the papers now in possession of the Clerk relating to the contested case of Dodge vs. Brooks be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The committee has power to order them printed. They will be taken from the files of the Clerk and referred to the Committee of Elections.

CLEMENT REEVES.

Mr. NICHOLSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, instructed to communicate to this House any information in his possession relative to the seizure of a certain piece of land on the Delaware river, near Delaware City, Newcastle county, in the State of Delaware, the property of Clement Reeves, and the erection thereon of fortifications; whether the same is still held, and whether the said Clement Reeves has received any and what compensation for such seizure and occupation.

HOLDING AN EVENING SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered an evening session to be held to-night.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be permitted to say that such a reconsideration could hardly be regarded as keeping good faith to the House, and to those members who have left the Hall with the express understanding that there will be an evening session. The Chair is informed that there are several gentlemen who desire to speak to-night.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My understanding is different from that expressed by the Chair, and therefore it was that I submitted the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. As the Chair has remarked that it would hardly be keeping good faith toward members for the House now to reconsider the order for an evening session, I desire to make a suggestion on the question of good faith. The House orders an evening session; yet when the evening comes there is nobody here but the pages and a few gentlemen, generally those who desire to speak. Now, I would like to ask the Chair if that is keeping good faith on the part of members toward those who may have consented to occupy the evening rather than the day time for their own speaking.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBBELL] obtained the floor on Saturday last, but declined to speak then. The Chair has positive information that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. STILLWELL,] desire to speak this evening. And the Chair will, at the risk of the censure of the House, decide that the House having by unanimous consent ordered that there shall be an evening session, for debate only upon the President's annual message, when the House shall be ready to adjourn this afternoon it must be with the view of having a session to-night at half past seven o'clock.

Mr. BROOKS. It is of high importance that members of the House should be educated to the point of remaining here until the close of the day's session. We passed a law here the other day when only six members were present. And I think the best way is to educate members up to their duty of remaining here, and thereby keeping good faith to the House and the country.

Mr. ELIOT. Is there a quorum now present?

The SPEAKER. There is not. And the Chair would hold that the motion to reconsider would fail from the want of a quorum.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. The Chair observed a moment ago that the gentleman from Ohio—myself—obtained the floor on Saturday last, but declined to speak at that time. I did obtain the floor, but it was late in the day's session; and at the request of members I gave way to a motion to adjourn. It was not that I declined to speak, for I was willing to go on; but I yielded the floor at the request of others. It was no fault of mine that I did not speak then. I am willing to yield the floor to-night to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DENISON.]

The SPEAKER. That gentleman is not now present. The Chair was informed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that he would certainly be here this evening and be ready to speak. The Chair only desires to carry out the order of the House.

The motion to reconsider the order of the House for an evening session was not pressed to a vote.

TAX ON RAILROAD COUPONS.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the internal revenue law, as it is now construed, requires all railroad companies to pay to the Government a revenue tax of five per cent. on all coupons due from said companies to the holders of their bonds, whether the companies are able to pay the bonds themselves or not; and whereas it is manifestly unjust to require the payment of such tax when the companies are unable to pay the coupons themselves: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to consider the propriety of so changing the law as to make such tax payable only when the coupons themselves are paid by such companies to the holders of the same, and to report by bill or otherwise.

W. G. RAYMOND AND OTHERS.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of W. G. Raymond, and the heirs of J. D. Turner, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

And then, on motion of Mr. POMEROY, (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.,) the House took a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., (Mr. GRINNELL occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore,) and resumed as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the consideration of the President's annual message.

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I voted a few days since against a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States in such manner as to prevent any State from levying taxes to pay debts contracted in carrying on the rebellion; and as my vote was different from that of all the Democrats of my own State, and most of the Democrats of the House, I have desired this opportunity to explain, not the vote, but the reasons for the vote, as a mark of respect for the opinions of my colleagues and the three hundred and fifty thousand Democratic voters in my own State, whose interests and opinions we are presumed, in some manner, to represent; and as I intend to give the same vote upon some twenty-five or thirty similar propositions now pending before Congress, I shall explain my views of the power to amend the Federal Constitution more fully on that account. And yet I am not unmindful of the fact that one who proposes at this day to discuss the power to amend the Constitution must appear like one repeating a tale twice told. And I further state that I do not speak for any side of this House, nor any party of men, not even for my own district, unless my constituents choose to adopt what I say; so that no one is accountable for such views as I may utter excepting myself.

The proposition against which I voted was introduced in this House, and under the pressure of the previous question passed without debate, without consideration, and with very extraordinary and indecent haste, considering the great power which it proposes to transfer from the States to the Federal Government and the Federal courts. Under this amendment the Federal Government would have the power and the right to inquire into the constitutionality of a tax levied to repair a township bridge; to stand between the State and its tax-payer, and superintend the collecting and disbursing of all taxes in a State lest the debts paid may have been contracted in carrying on the rebellion; for a tax levied and collected for a lawful purpose might be diverted after it had reached the treasury and it would then be a most interesting employment for the Supreme Court to compel the State to refund to the citizens the taxes improperly collected or improperly paid out.

The only good which I can see in this very great change in the organic law of this nation, is that the Supreme Court would not be idle for the want of business, and its judges would not have time to travel about the country making speeches to the negroes, and in that way electioneering for the office of President. The provision will be found to be impracticable and worthless.

Nor would I desire that the Federal Government or any State government should assume to pay, or levy taxes upon the citizen to pay, debts contracted in carrying on the rebellion. God knows we have debts enough of our own to pay. Nor do I know of but one class of men who intend that the Federal Government shall assume and pay the debts of the confederate or rebel States, and that embraces the extreme abolitionists, or that class of men who claim that such States were alien enemies, and are now conquered provinces, for they well know that, as such, the conqueror takes the provinces with their burdens upon them; that if they are successful in thus holding, they must, according to the law of nations, pay their debts. And they must further know, that in pursuance of this well-settled principle of international law, Great Britain is even now gathering up her accounts to make a demand upon our Government for the payment of the debts of the confederacy, and if the theory of the Radicals be true, she will make you pay them. But I am not willing to pay their debts, nor in favor of so treating them as to make the Federal Government in any manner liable for them. Nor is it necessary to alter the Constitution to meet this end, a remedy already being provided in the Supreme Court for the express purpose, and which would most assuredly decide against the payment of any such debt.

But, sir, I have other reasons for my vote, and to my mind higher considerations than can arise from taxes or debts in any form. It will be observed that the proposed amendment is to give the Federal Government the power and the right to dictate to sovereign States the debts which they shall not pay. This is a very extraordinary power to place in the Federal Constitution, to compel States to repudiate debts, a course which States, like individuals, are sufficiently prone to follow without the excuse which you propose to furnish. And this may be the wrong time to set the example of repudiation, until we see our own vast debt provided for. More than two thirds of this House appear to have no doubt of the policy or the power to make so great a change in the organic law of this nation. I deny the policy, and very much doubt the power, even though you hang upon your proposal the odious words "rebel debt." By looking at our files it will be seen that you have one proposition to grant the right of suffrage to certain negro soldiers who served in the war, another to grant certain lands in pursuance of some military order of one General Hunter, another that no State shall make any distinction in the civil rights of persons residing therein on account of color or descent, and another providing for colored persons sitting as jurors, and I believe some twenty or thirty others.

There is one peculiarity which runs through all of these proposed amendments, and that is, to add to the powers delegated to the Federal Government, and to that extent take from the reserved rights of the States.

These propositions have come upon us with such rapidity and profusion as to indicate that Congress had no other business to require its attention; and that the people had become so weary of "the best Government ever devised by the wisdom of man" that they had selected and sent here the most ultra men in the land to destroy it by usurpations of power under the guise of constitutional amendments.

In my judgment, it is a matter of grave responsibility to make vital changes in the organic law of a nation, and should not be done except upon the most urgent necessity, and upon points wherein we have the undoubted right, and at a time when the public mind is in condition for serious deliberation. Surely not when one third of the States are unrepresented in Congress.

It becomes us, as we regard the oath which we have taken, to look well at the charter under which we claim these powers, to see if we have the right to make these changes lest we place acts upon the record of this nation which are evidence of our presumption, as well as our imbecility, wickedness, and folly.

In order to understand what powers are placed under the control of two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States, it is important to look at the condition of the States and the people before the adoption of the Constitution of 1789, as well as the Constitution itself.

In looking at that period in our history as a people, the first important paper that we find is the Declaration of Independence, standing comparatively alone, and marking the birth of a great nation. In that instrument we find three distinct propositions. The first is, "that all men are created equal;" but they did not state that as the reason for their independence, or they would have enunciated the fact, and claimed by virtue thereof the right to be free; nor did they regard this abstract proposition as the basis of government, excepting so far as it applied to themselves and the white people whom they represented, for they then had two distinct races of men in their midst who were not then, nor have they since, been permitted to realize the great truth "that all men are created equal." Neither the Indian nor the negro have been permitted to participate in the affairs of this Government up to this hour. The negro was enslaved and the Indian has been moved from land to land, and we appear to have kept him as an excuse for squandering millions of money, which we generally place in the hands of a well-organized band of thieves, who stand between the Treasury Department and the Indian; and that is a most fortunate tribe which receives one tenth of the money appropriated. And yet we continually hear repeated "All men are created equal."

The country is now filled with fatter-day saints, who claim that it has especial reference to the negro, and are willing to sacrifice their own Government and the liberties of their own children to make it true. And yet it would be fair to presume that the great men who made our system of government understood the great truths which they uttered and the provisions of the Constitution which they had established, and were able to apply them to the ruling of the people.

The second proposition in that instrument is that all just Governments are founded upon the consent of the governed; and based upon this second proposition, the colonies no longer consenting to be governed by Great Britain because certain of their chartered rights as Englishmen had been violated and disregarded, the authors of the Declaration proclaim their third proposition, "that these colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." And to maintain this conclusion they enter into Articles of Confederation, put their men and means in a common fund, fight the battles of the Revolution, obtain their independence, and repudiate their debts.

The Confederation was merely an agreement between sovereign Powers, and provided, in so many words, that each State should maintain its sovereignty in all respects wherein the power had not been delegated to the Confederation. The independence thus acquired left each State not only free and independent of Great Britain, but of each other, and, as such, they had a right to declare war, make peace, contract alliances with any other or foreign Power and do any and all things which sovereign Powers may do. And it was the representatives of these Powers that made the Constitution, and they stated in the beginning of their labors the objects at which they aimed. They represented sovereign Powers, and they intended to relinquish enough of the powers they represented to accomplish the objects of the Federal Union, and no more. They left us a very peculiar system of government, and if sovereignty means that power over which there is no superior, whose decrees when made are final, then our whole system of government is made up of local sovereignties, each absolute within its own local jurisdiction, and acting as so many checks against the flowing of power into a centralized despotism.

When the people of a township, a county, or State, have determined by ballot the choice of officers to execute the laws of each municipal corporation, they have exercised one of the attributes of sovereignty.

The States furnish the courts to protect the citizen in his rights of person and of property, the descent of estates, and regulate all of the domestic relations of the citizen under the Government. Each State is as entirely independent of every other State as if it were a foreign Power, and just as independent of the Federal Government within the reserved powers and in all respects wherein the powers have not been delegated in the Constitution. And the Federal Government is as completely a consolidated Government and as perfect a Union, within the delegated powers, as it would be if there were no State governments in existence; and each is as completely master of their respective powers as they would be if the other did not exist.

It is to the Constitution alone that we must look to ascertain what powers were delegated and what reserved, and the condition of the reserved rights, whether reserved absolutely to the States, or whether the reserved rights were to be taken away by the will of any other power than the people of the State for whose benefit the reservation was made.

Any person may invest a portion of his estate in the stock of a bank, and thus place that much of his earnings under the control of the majority of the stockholders or directors of such bank, but they do not thereby get any right to control that portion of his estate which he retains; that part of his property still belongs to him, and is under his control as much as if he had no interest in the bank, and he cannot be made to part with it except with his own free will. So it was competent for the States when they created this governmental organization called the United States, by the Constitution, to delegate therein certain powers and the right to do certain things, and thus place the powers delegated under the control of the Federal majorities, and reserve certain other powers to be controlled by the people of each State, and for the exercise and control of which they were not to be answerable to any other power.

If the States did thus absolutely and unconditionally reserve these powers, then they cannot be taken away by two thirds of this House and three fourths of the States any more than the majority of the stockholders of a bank, in which I might have stock, could take my horse or my farm for the use of the corporation, because the States never placed these reserved powers in the common fund of powers to be controlled by Federal majorities. Their condition was the same as to these reserved powers after the adoption of the Constitution as before. The people of each State constituted a sovereignty before the adoption of that instrument. They were equally sovereign over the reserved rights after its adoption, and they cannot be taken away, except by the will of each State, unless there be something in the Constitution to authorize it; for a State, like an individual, cannot be bound further than it agrees to bind itself. Have the States parted with their absolute control over these reserved rights by agreeing to the power to amend the Federal Constitution? If so, then these powers were not reserved absolutely, but only retained until the Federal majorities as represented by two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States may choose to transfer them, against the will of the people of a State, or it may be one fourth of the States, from the respective States to the Federal Government. This point ought to be settled by the Constitution, and I think it is. We find therein two provisions bearing directly upon the power of amendment. The first is the fifth article, and is in these words:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

And the other is the tenth amendment, and in the following words:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The tenth amendment fixes the type of limitation upon the organic law, and makes the Federal Government one of delegated and not original powers. We are not, therefore, to take any power by inference. The power to be exercised must be clearly expressed in the Constitution, or we cannot take it. We have in the fifth article of the Constitution the right to amend, for such is the word used, but not to make anew. It would not be an amendment to abolish this Constitution and adopt the old Articles of Confederation, or the unwritten constitution of England, or the laws and customs of France or Russia.

An amendment must, therefore, be of something germane to the instrument; it must be of something which we already have in the Constitution or it is not an amendment, but the making of a new Constitution, and would only be binding upon such States as agree to be bound by it, and could not become a part of the Constitution until every State should adopt the same. If one State should refuse its consent, it would not, by virtue of our Constitution, be binding upon any, because while that instrument provided that when it should be ratified by nine States it should be binding upon the nine, it made no provision either for making a new Constitution, nor for its own destruction.

This view would limit the amendatory power of the Constitution to the scope of the delegated powers from the States to the Federal Government, and prohibit the taking of any powers not delegated: and that the men who made the Constitution so understood it is shown by the instrument itself. The first exception to the to a power of amendment, in the fifth article, refers delegated power—the right to control foreign commerce. The second exception to the exercise of the power refers to the manner of voting by States or a method of doing business under the Constitution, and not a delegated power. As germane to the general power to regulate foreign commerce, an amendment could have been made prohibiting the slave trade before 1808, and for this reason a particular limitation upon the amendatory power of the Constitution was necessary to guard it. As an incident to the legislative power vested in a Congress of the United States in providing methods to do business under the Constitution, it would be competent to change the Constitution by amendment in such manner as to deprive a State of its equal vote in the Senate, and to prevent this the second particular limitation is found in the proviso.

From this it appears that the framers of the Constitution regarded the amendatory power as applicable to its delegated powers or grants and its methods of doing business, and for that reason made these exceptions to the exercise of the power. These exceptions furnish the rule for the exercise of the power of amendment. Under this rule you may so modify the Constitution by amendment in its delegated powers and methods of doing business as to give it upon its own principles a more complete effect.

This construction would give sufficient scope and influence to the power of amendment in the fifth article. It can act upon any and all of the delegated powers. Two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States may so change the Constitution as to make the justices of the Supreme Court elective. They might make the office of President to continue for ten or twenty years. Under the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, you might so amend the Constitution as to get power to make a "greenback" a legal tender for the payment of debts; and so on through all of the delegated powers. But it is claimed as a fair rule of construction, that denying the power to amend in two particulars admits the power in all other respects; and this is the correct rule, and the men who made the Constitution so understood it, and to avoid the operation of this rule, and that there should be no implied or constructive powers in the Constitution, they adopted the tenth amendment, declaratory of its meaning, namely, that "the powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively or the people."

The tenth amendment was in lieu of the article in the Confederation providing for the sovereignty of the States; and was placed there for the express purpose of keeping the reserved rights of the States from the control of the Federal majorities. And this restriction upon the authority or scope of the Constitution includes its amendatory power, as well as all other powers and grants it contains.

Unless the scope of amendment is limited, it is difficult to see the use of the exceptions in the proviso, or in what manner the restriction attaches to the power of amendment in the fifth article. The amendatory power of the fifth article in the Constitution is as much within the general restriction of the tenth amendment attaching to all the other delegated powers contained in the organic law as it is within the two special limitations contained in the proviso; otherwise the power of amendment could be resorted to in defiance of the two special limitations, and they could be taken from the Constitution by amendment. To assume this conclusion would not do justice to the patriotism or wisdom of the great men who made and adopted the Constitution for the welfare of this people.

This construction affords abundant room and scope for the amendatory power of the fifth article to act upon and modify any and all of the delegated powers, and gives a clear and distinct office to be filled by the tenth amendment. Each provision is consistent with the other, and the Constitution consistent with itself. For a period of more than seventy years no other use was ever attempted to be made of this power of amendment. The first ten amendments to the Constitution were only declaratory of its meaning and in limitation of its power, and stand as a bill of rights for the citizen or a perpetual protest against any encroachment upon the reserved rights of the States or the people of the States.

The eleventh amendment was proposed in 1791, and is a limitation upon the judicial power of the United States. The twelfth amendment, in 1803, was a change in the mode of electing the Vice President, preserving the system of Electors as provided in the Constitution. It would be competent for two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States to abolish the Electors and provide for a direct vote of the people for the office of President and Vice President by amendment; for it would be within the amendatory power of the fifth article, as it only relates to the delegated powers or a method of proceeding as provided in the Constitution. No attempt has ever been made to make a different use of this power of amendment until this war uprooted and overturned the foundations of all law, and substituted the wicked passions of angry men in their stead.

If the opposite view of this power be correct, then there is no limit to the power of amendment excepting the discretion of two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States, and it renders the tenth amendment of the Constitution without force or meaning. This provision speaks of delegated powers. What are delegated powers? I employ an agent to buy me a farm; he acts under delegated power. The original power is with me, and he must act according to his power or he acts without authority. This provision also speaks of reserved rights. What! a reserved right taken away without the consent of the party for whose benefit the reservation was made! Was ever such a right called a reserved right? A person may sell his farm and reserve the minerals under the same with the power to remove them, or he may sell the minerals and reserve the farm. Upon this simple principle, which no one ever doubted, depends the title to millions of property in my county alone. What would the owners of those rich coal mines think of reserved rights if told that they could be taken from them without their consent? And yet you ignore their title by the construction which you adopt to take reserved powers from the States to the Federal Government. Your construction would enable you so to amend the Constitution as to strike from the fifth article the words two thirds and three fourths, and substitute the word majority; making our Constitution a mere barometer to measure the ups and downs of party, and worthless. The same power which will enable you to control the gathering of taxes in a State would enable you to remove from the Constitution the injunction that you shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government, and then abolish the Legislature and the local or State courts, and then the State itself. Then the American Congress becomes what the British Parliament always has been, omnipotent, and the Constitution becomes an instrument of original and no longer delegated powers. Some of the majority in this House appear to talk as if there were rights reserved to the States, but they do not state that they are nor where the rights of the States cease and those of the Federal Government begin. Let them make the point where the Constitution has. Those not delegated are reserved. It cannot be that a solemn provision of the Constitution, like the tenth amendment, was placed there for no purpose.

No, sir, it was by this that the framers of the Constitution intended to seal up the reserved rights of the States, as a miser does his wealth, beyond the reach of profane hands. It lifts the Constitution above the filth of party politics and beyond the reach of party malice, and makes it truly national; for nothing less than the whole nation can change it in its powers. Like the heavens, which are over all, and send upon all the bright sunshine and showers, and "with the early and later rains" fill the earth with rich bounties and blessings for all, and yet is beyond the reach of all, so does this place the Constitution around and over all, protecting all, and furnishing prosperity and happiness and liberty for all, and yet is beyond the reach of any less than all. These amendments speak of the rights of trial, the qualifications of jurors, the right of suffrage. If these rights are not sacred, and sacredly reserved to the States, then we have none that are. These are the richest jewels of this people, any one of which is of more value than all the gems that were ever dug from the mountains and all the pearls the ocean ever concealed. And yet you propose to take this rich and priceless inheritance, which descended from our fathers, and bestow it upon another and a foreign race!

Such being my view of the powers delegated to the Federal Government and the rights reserved to the States, I cannot vote for any amendment of the Constitution, excepting such as relate to the delegated powers or the methods of doing business, giving it a more complete effect upon its own principles. The propositions before us are not amendments, but new and additional powers, and if adopted, would be usurpations and invasions upon the reserved rights of the States or the people. I cannot vote for any amendment which will confer any new or additional power to those already delegated in the Constitution. I am fully satisfied that sufficient power was delegated in that instrument, to say nothing of the enlarged powers by construction, and the still greater by congressional, executive, and military usurpations. But, as it is, this war never could have taken place if the rights of each State had been respected by Congress and the people of every other State. We have heard very much of "the first gun" in this rebellion. That first gun was not fired by the rebels at Fort Sumter, nor by old John Brown in Virginia, but it was fired by the American Congress when that body passed the Missouri compromise and usurped the right to legislate upon the subject of slavery, a mere domestic institution, resting with the people of each State, as other domestic institutions now do; and that usurpation having been acquiesced in by the people North and South, led to the belief that at least one of the reserved rights, one of the domestic institutions, was liable to be influenced and controlled by Federal majorities. And the people of New England have been firing guns ever since; and after forty years of insult and outrage they had a return shot, ending in war; and after four years of most bloody conflict, not instituted but perverted for that purpose, slavery has been abolished. And I say, peace to its ashes! I would not disturb the slumbers of the dead if I had the power, and I hope that every State which ever was in this Union will ratify the amendment of the Constitution, that there be no more slavery in this land, and we shall then have at least one question settled forever.

If this war had been carried on for the purpose of compelling the States North and West to adopt slavery against the will of the people of such States, then you could appreciate the view which I now take, and you would point to the provision of the Constitution to which I have called your attention, and claimed that the organic law protected your domestic institutions and justified you in changing or abolishing them, as the people of each State might choose, and all men would have said that you were right.

A leading and highly respectable journal in the city of Philadelphia declares that by casting the vote to which I have alluded I have rendered myself infamous, and that I do not represent the true sentiment of my district. When I think I do not represent the views of my constituents I will resign and go home: but all the men in my district or my State could not get me to vote for any of these usurpations of power, even though they are called amendments. I must be permitted to keep my oath and support the Constitution as I understand it.

And it is to be expected that I should be misunderstood, misrepresented, and abused; such has been the sure fate of men with firmness enough to stand in the face of popular prejudice and uphold what they believe to be right. St. Paul dared to be a Christian, and for this he was twice beaten with rods, once stoned, and made to fight with wild beasts at Ephesus. And before and ever since the ignorant and the prejudiced have been ready to sing psalms and songs of praise to the party in power, however corrupt and wicked, and shout "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," "Release unto us, Barabbas!" and they can now add, "for he is one of us." But so long as I am in this House you shall have one vote for the old Constitution, and with God's help, one vote against all of your efforts to usurp new powers for the Federal Government; and that embraces all of your proposed amendments. I have no desire to change the Constitution which the fathers gave us, the Bible which they read, nor the God which they worshiped. But I do not expect this House to listen to me or heed what I say. "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." If you believe not the Constitution and the laws, neither would you be persuaded if God should send Washington and Jefferson and Jackson and Webster and Clay and all the dead patriots and heroes of our land to testify against you. You would call them old slaveholders or copperheads, and bid them go where they had business.

Your purposes are clearly indicated in your proposed amendments. The followers of the veiled prophet are about to see his features; the veil is being removed. But where is the caldron of heated oil? The people must prepare it. You are about to destroy the Constitution of our fathers. The "league with death and covenant with hell" must be removed and the Chicago platform of 1860 substituted in its place. Nor does it matter that it was a sectional, abolition platform; we must have a sectional, abolition Constitution. But is there no other sacrifice which can be taken in its stead? When Abraham was about to sacrifice his only son, Isaac, as he believed, by the command of God, and when he had built the altar and prepared the wood, another sacrifice was provided. I know that you have the altar and the wood ready to sacrifice our Constitution, and I ask you to call upon the deities which you worship and see if some substitute cannot be found; call upon the negro or the Republican party, and it may be that something less dear to the American people than their Government might answer. But if not, when you see the smoke ascending from the altar and the sacrifice, remember that it takes with it the liberties of your country and the liberties of your children, and that your children's children will condemn you for the sacrifice.

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN LABOR.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, the eloquent gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Voorhees], whose voice during the war has been so potent in the councils of the Democratic party, and who has borne so prominent a part on this floor in resisting all the legislation by which the rebellion was to be, and has been, crushed, in the course of his recent defense of the President's message and policy landed him as a champion of free trade. He said the President had struck "a manly and honest blow" at the protection afforded by the tariff to the varied industries of the country, and cited this brief extract from his message in proof of his assertion:

"Now, in their turn, the property and income of the country should bear their just proportion of the burden of taxation, while in our import system, through means of which increased vitality is incidentally imparted to all the industrial interests of the nation, the duties should be so adjusted as to fall most heavily on articles of luxury, leaving the necessities of life as free from taxation as the absolute wants of the Government, economically administered, will justify."

Entertaining, sir, the views I do, and which I propose to submit to the committee, I had found in that portion of the President's message the expression of a desire to foster the industry, develop the resources, and increase the wealth and power of the country. Till the gentleman called my attention to the fact, I had not observed that his expression was enigmatical and susceptible of at least a double construction. I will not, however, detain the committee by endeavoring to ascertain the President's meaning, which time will disclose: but without abandoning the hope that my apprehension of his words is correct, will proceed, in a general way, to demonstrate that the gentleman's views as to how we may best equalize and increase the wealth of the people of the United States are erroneous. In the course of his remarks he said:

"We have two great interests in this country, one of which has prostrated the other. The past four years of suffering and war has been the opportune harvest of the manufacturer. The looms and machine shops of New England and the iron furnaces of Pennsylvania have been more prolific of wealth to their owners than the most dazzling gold mines of the earth."

Again:

"The present law of tariff is being rapidly understood. It is no longer a deception, but rather a well-defined and clearly recognized outrage. The agricultural labor of the land is driven to the counters of the most gigantic monopoly ever before sanctioned by law. From its exorbitant demands there is no escape. The European manufacturer is forbidden our ports of trade for fear he might sell his goods at cheaper rates and thus relieve the burdens of the consumers. We have declared by law that there is but one market into which our citizens shall go to make their purchases, and we have left it to the owners of the market to fix their own prices. The bare statement of such a principle foreshadows at once the consequences which flow from it. One class of citizens, and by far the largest and most useful, is placed at the mercy, for the necessities as well as luxuries of life, of the fostered, favored, and protected class to whose aid the whole power of the Government is given."

And again:

"Free trade with all the markets of the world is the true theory of government."

Sir, as I proceed, it will, I think, appear that we have more than "two great interests," and that protection such as can only be afforded by a tariff is required by them all; and that they are interwoven with such exquisite harmony that no one of them can suffer alone; and that to destroy any one is to impair the vital power of all.

Gruff old Samuel Johnson said in substance that, when he contemplated the many diseases to which human life is a prey and the countless means for its destruction, he wondered that anybody lived to maturity; and when, on the other hand, he beheld the infinitude of specifics offered for every form of disease he was led to wonder that people ever died. And the thought recurs to me as I contemplate the condition of our country from either of two stand-points—that of the despondent patriot and of him who conceals his determined treason under expressions of acquiescent loyalty, or that of the cheerful patriot who knows something of our unmeasured resources. Regarding our debt, which set forth in figures seems so crushing, and our pension lists, which, embracing more names than did the muster rolls of the contending armies at Waterloo, announce the fearful amount of infirmity, widowhood, and orphanage for which we are bound to provide; remembering how the ruling powers of other nations hate us; looking at the immense extent and resources of the British dominions on our north, and considering how sedulously the imperial Government has pursued the design of uniting those dominions and constructing such governmental works as would "render Canada accessible to her Majesty's forces at all seasons of the year," and that "as well upon grounds peculiar to Canada as from considerations affecting the interests of the other colonies and of the whole empire;" remembering, again, the Monroe doctrine, and the fact that he who occupies the throne of Mexico is, though an Austrian, the creature of the ambitious man whose will is law to France; and, in view of these facts, considering the internal condition of our country, with nearly a million square miles of our territory desolated by four years of stubborn war, and with its people divided into three classes, distrusting and hating each other—four millions of them born as things for a market and strangers to the enjoyment of any human right; six or eight millions more poor and ignorant nearly as they, and unused and averse to labor, less hopeful, and tending each year more nearly to dependence on the rifle, the net, and the line; and the remaining class, less numerous than either of the others, but possessing all the wealth and culture, acknowledging themselves a conquered people, but with rare exceptions proving by all their acts that they are unconquered, and that they hate the Union, its Constitution, and the people who maintained the unity of the one and the sovereignty of the other as intensely as they did when they began the unholy war of history; regarding, I say, these facts, the disguised traitor may still hope for the accomplishment of his purpose, and the despondent patriot may well despair.

On the other hand, he who contemplates our geographical position, which makes us, on the one ocean, business neighbors to seven hundred and fifty millions of the people of Asia, and on the other to two hundred and fifty millions of the busy people of Europe, our vast agricultural resources, our unestimated mineral wealth, the magnitude of our rivers, and the natural wealth of the country they drain, the capacity of our people for enterprise, their ingenuity, and their persistence, and who withal comprehends the laws of political economy and social science, and believes that a free and educated people will give practical effect to great truths, smiles with derision upon him who sees danger to our country in the complicated facts suggested.

I have before me, sir, the yellowed pages of a pamphlet, printed in London in 1677, which contains a panacea for all our ills, the suggestions of which, illustrated by the experience of our own and other nations, will, if applied to our resources, bring permanent peace and prosperity to our country, elevate the freedman into the prosperous and intelligent citizen, bless the master spirits of the South with wealth beyond their past imaginings, and give them, "the mean whites," as they designate their poor neighbors, as sturdy competitors in the race of life; will reconstruct their broken railroads and canals, rebuild their ruined cities, towns, and villages, and make their barren and wasted fields to bloom and blossom as those of the fairest portions of the North, of Belgium, France, or England.

This quaint old pamphlet was written by "Andrew Yarranton, Gentleman," and is entitled, "England's Improvement by Sea and Land. How to outdo the Dutch without Fighting, to Pay Debts without Moneys, to set at Work all the Poor of England with the Growth of our own Lands." It disposes very effectually of the gentleman's [Mr. Voorhies] proposition that free trade "is the true theory of government."

When Andrew Yarranton wrote, the Dutch were disputing the supremacy of the seas with England, and she was exporting raw materials and buying manufactured articles; and one object of his pamphlet was to relieve the English people from the taunt of the Dutch that they "sold their whole skins for a sixpence, and bought back the tails for a shilling"—a commercial policy which the American people, with rare and brief exceptions, have steadily pursued. To Yarranton and Sir George Downing, author of the Navigation Act, an American by birth, and a member of the first graduating class of Harvard college, England, in my judgment, owes more of her wealth and power than to any other two men, however illustrious their names may be in her history. Before they influenced her counsels Holland was mistress of the sea. But the Navigation Act and the employment of her people on the growth of her lands, transferred the scepter to England. The purpose of Downing's bill as declared in its preamble, was "to keep his Majesty's subjects in the plantations in a firmer dependence," to "increase English shipping," and to insure "the vent of English woollens and other manufactures and commodities." What Yarranton and Downing taught their country we can practice for the benefit of ours. And as England outdid the Dutch without fighting, so can we outdo her by the arts of peace, and enforce the Monroe doctrine against the world without firing a gun; and, vast as is our indebtedness, strangers will come and cast their lot with us and liquidate it if we so legislate as "to set at work all the poor of" the United States "with the growth of our own lands." They will bring with them arts and industries and implements with which we are not familiar; will open new quarries, mines, and ore banks; will build new furnaces, forges, mills, and workshops; will revive wasted lands and open new fields, and by creating a home market will enable the farmer to practice skillful and remunerative husbandry, and will create American commerce by enabling our merchants to supply ships with assorted cargoes of American goods.

THE ONE WANT OF OUR COUNTRY.

Sir, the pressing want of our country is men. We need not sigh for additional territory. We need go to no foreign nation for any product of agriculture. Abundant as are our ascertained stores of gold, silver, coal, iron, copper, zinc, lead, cinnabar, kaoline, petroleum, and the infinite number of substances man has utilized, the extent of our mineral wealth is unmeasured and unimagined. And our ocean-bound coasts, the immense inland seas that bound us on the north, the land-locked Gulf that laves our southern shores, and our grand rivers, impel us to commercial enterprise, and proclaim the one great want of our country to be man. Labor alone can make these unparalleled resources available; and when by securing to industry its just reward we shall develop and attract hither from other lands a supply of labor that will make the march of our conquest over the elements of our wealth steadily progressive, our debt, though expressed by the numerals required to tell it now, will shrink into comparative insignificance, and the Powers which by treachery and disregard of international law during the last four years would have destroyed us, will assume relatively Lilliputian proportions.

These are not new thoughts. So long ago as 1689, Locke, in his Essay on Civil Government, said:

"Let any one consider what the difference is between an acre of land planted with tobacco or sugar, sown with wheat or barley, and an acre of the same land lying in common, without any husbandry upon it; and he will find the improvement of labor makes the far greater part of the value. I think it will be but a very modest computation to say that of the products of the earth useful to the life of a man, nine tenths are the effects of labor. Nay, if we will rightly consider things as they come to our use, and cast up the several expenses about them—what in them is purely owing to nature, and what to labor—we shall find that in most of them ninety-nine hundredths are wholly to be put on the account of labor. There cannot be a clearer demonstration of anything than several nations of the Americans are of this, who are rich in land and poor in all the comforts of life; whom nature having furnished as rich as any other people with the materials of plenty, that is a fruitful soil, apt to produce in abundance what might serve for food, raiment, and delight, yet for want of improving it by labor have not one hundredth part of the conveniences we enjoy."

But to make labor fully available it must be steadily employed and generously rewarded, and to secure these results the employments of a country must be largely diversified. A nation whose territory is broad and remote from dense populations cannot, by pursuing commerce and agriculture alone, prosper or endure. This is the decree of nature. Land, as well as man, requires rest and food; and a purely agricultural and commercial nation can afford neither of these. The social history of the world verifies this proposition. To make a nation prosperous remunerative employment must be accessible to all its people; and to that end industry must be so diversified that he who has not the strength for agricultural or other labor requiring muscle may make his feeble sinews available in some gentler employment. Agriculture and commerce afford few stimulants to inventive genius; diversified industry offers many. Childhood in a purely agricultural community is wasted in idleness, as are the winter months of its robust men, and to realize the truth of the maxim that time is money, the varied industry of a country should offer employment to all for all seasons of the year, that each day may be made to earn its own subsistence. And herein is illustrated the harmony of interests, for where diversity of employment is successfully promoted, agriculture finds its readiest markets and earns its richest rewards: for within accessible distance from the city or town the farmer has a market for those perishable productions which will not bear extended transportation, but the cultivation of which, in alternation with white or hard crops, strengthens and enriches his land. But of this hereafter.

WHY THE SOUTH DEMANDED FREE TRADE.

Unhappily, sir, it has not been the policy of those who have governed our country to permit, much less to encourage, such needed diversification of employment and productions. I have before me an imperial octavo volume embracing more than nine hundred pages, and illustrated with the likenesses of many distinguished southern statesmen and teachers. It is entitled "Cotton is King, and Pro-Slavery Arguments, comprising the Writings of Hammond, Harper, Christie, Stringfellow, Hodge, Bledsoe, and Cartwright on this Important Subject, by E. N. Elliott, LL. D., President of Planters' College, Mississippi, with an Essay on Slavery in the Light of International Law, by the Editor." This volume, so valuable to the future historian, bears the imprint of Prichard, Abbott & Loomis, Augusta, Georgia, 1860. And the title page announces that it was "published and sold exclusively by subscription." When this work was published, the establishment of the southern confederacy was, doubtless, a foregone conclusion in the minds of its publishers and their patrons; and there was, therefore, no further reason for the southern leaders disguising the purposes they had had in view while governing our country in the name of the Democratic party. I refer to it in order that these distinguished writers may, for themselves, declare the aims and motives that governed them. The objects they proposed to attain are thus expressed under the head of "Economical Relations of Slavery:—"

"The opposition to the protective tariff by the South arose from two causes: the first, openly avowed at the time, and the second clearly deducible from the policy it pursued; the one to secure the foreign market for its cotton, the other to obtain a bountiful supply of provisions at cheap rates." * * * "But they could not monopolize the market unless they could obtain a cheap supply of food and clothing for their negroes, and raise their cotton at such reduced prices as to undersell their rivals. A manufacturing population, with its mechanical coadjutors in the midst of the provision growers, on a scale such as the protective policy contemplated, it was conceived would create a permanent market for their products and enhance the price; whereas if this manufacturing could be prevented, and a system of free trade be adopted, the South would constitute the principal provision market of the country, and the fertile lands of the North supply the cheap food demanded for its slaves."

Again:

"By the protective policy, the planters expected to have the cost of both provisions and clothing increased, and their ability to monopolize the foreign markets diminished in a corresponding degree. If they could establish free trade, it would insure the American market to foreign manufacturers, secure the foreign markets for their leading staples, repress home manufactures, force a large number of the northern men into agriculture, multiply the growth and diminish the price of provisions, feed and clothe their slaves at lower rates, produce their cotton for a third or fourth of former prices, rival all other countries in its cultivation, monopolize the trade in the article throughout the whole of Europe, and build up a commerce that would make us the ruler of the seas."

Again:

"The markets in the Southwest, now so important, were then quite limited. As the protective system, coupled with the contemplated internal improvements, if successfully accomplished, would inevitably tend to enhance the price of agricultural products, while the free-trade, anti-internal-improvement policy would as certainly reduce their value, the two systems were long considered so antagonistic that the success of the one must sound the knell of the other. Indeed, so fully was Ohio impressed with the necessity of promoting manufactures that all capital thus employed was for many years entirely exempt from taxation."

"It was in vain that the friends of protection appealed to the fact that the duties levied on foreign goods did not necessarily enhance the cost to the consumer; that the competition among the home manufacturers and between them and foreigners had greatly reduced the price of nearly every article properly protected; that foreign manufacturers always had, and always would, advance their prices according to our dependence upon them; that domestic competition was the only safety the country had against foreign imposition; that it was necessary we should become our own manufacturers in a fair degree to render ourselves independent of other nations in time of war as well as to guard against the vicillations in foreign legislation; that the South would be vastly the gainer by having the market for its products at its own doors and avoiding the cost of their transit across the Atlantic; that, in the event of the repression, or want of proper expansion, of our manufactures by the adoption of the free-trade system, the imports of foreign goods to meet the public wants would soon exceed the ability of the people to pay, and inevitably involve the country in bankruptcy. Southern politicians remained inflexible and refused to accept any policy except free trade and the utter abandonment of the principle of protection. Whether they were jealous of the greater prosperity of the North and desirous to cripple its energies, or whether they were truly fearful of bankrupting the South, we shall not wait to inquire."

The author doubtless felt that it would be sacrilegious to inquire too curiously into the motives of the ministers of a monarch so absolute as King Cotton, but we, who do not live in the fear of his majesty, may freely, and not without advantage, consider the questions propounded.

And again, in connection with the assertion that with slave labor they could not become manufacturers, and must therefore remain at the mercy of the North, both as to food and clothing, unless the European markets should be retained, the writer says southern statesmen saw that—

"Combinations of capitalists, whether engaged in manufacturing wool, cotton, or iron, would draw off labor from the cultivation of the soil, and cause large bodies of the producers to become consumers, and that roads and canals, connecting the West with the East, were effectual means of bringing the agricultural and manufacturing classes into closer proximity, to the serious injury of the planters."

These honest and fearless exponents of the free trade of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] says the President is an advocate seem to have considered the chief end of man, that is, of all American men, save slaveholding planters, to be to produce cheap food for slaves; and in this book, so remarkable for its frankness, we find a quotation from a speech made by one of them, which runs as follows:

"We must prevent the increase of manufactories, force the surplus labor into agriculture, promote the cultivation of our unimproved western lands, until provisions are so multiplied and reduced in price that the slave can be fed so cheaply as to enable us to grow our sugar at three cents a pound. Then, without protective duties, we can rival Cuba in the production of that staple and drive her from our markets."

RESULTS OF FREE TRADE.

By the persistent and domineering pursuit of these ends by the South, and the unhallowed spirit of compromise which always controlled the North, the manufactures of the country were destroyed; and the West (for great railway thoroughfares had not then been constructed) having been reduced to dependence on the South for her market, consented with Pennsylvania, New York, and New England, to her own ruin. It may be that having deprived herself of any other market, her poverty and not her will consented; but the story of her seduction and ruin is thus happily told in "Cotton is King:"

"The West which had long looked to the East for a market had its attention now turned to the South, the most certain and convenient market for the sale of its products; the planters affording to the farmers the market they had in vain sought from the manufacturers. In the mean time steamboat navigation was acquiring perfection on the western rivers, the great natural outlets for western produce, and became a means of communication between the Northwest and the Southwest, as well as with the trade and commerce of the Atlantic cities. This gave an impulse to industry and enterprise west of the Alleghanies unparalleled in the history of the country. Whitherso the bounds of slave labor were extending from Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, westward over Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas, the area of free labor was enlarging with equal rapidity in the Northwest, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan. Thus within these provision and cotton regions were the forests cleared away or the prairies broken up simultaneously by those two antagonistic forces. Opponents no longer, they were harmonized by the fusion of their interests, the connecting link between them being the steamboat. Thus also was a tripartite alliance formed, by which the western farmer, the southern planter, and the English manufacturer became united in a common bond of interest, the whole giving their support to the doctrine of free trade."

With this unnatural alliance the work seemed to be completed, and in verification of the theories of the northern leaders of the Democratic party who, like the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Voorhees,] took their opinions from the southern planters, the commerce of our country should have rapidly expanded, and Great Britain furnished a market for all our surplus grain. But what were the results? The laboring people of the manufacturing States were soon without employment and living upon past earnings. The deposit lines in our savings banks ran down; the banks of discount and deposit lost their specie; merchants made small sales, or sold on long and uncertain credits; and sagacious men saw that bankruptcy impended over all. The ruined people of the North and East were unable to pay for the products of the South or West. Large numbers of them, abandoning the callings to which they had been trained, and in the pursuit of which while providing amply for the support of their families they could have accumulated capital and added to the national wealth and power, became unskillful farmers on mortgaged land in the distant West. England, no longer simply mistress of the sea, but the commercial mistress of the world, seeking customers who could pay for what they purchased, bought her grain from the Baltic, from Egypt, or wherever she could buy it cheapest or with greatest convenience; and the western farmer, having supplied the coarse provisions that were required as cheap food for the slaves, and more costly food for two hundred and fifty thousand masters, saw his wheat rot in the field, and consumed his corn as fuel.

But what was the effect of this free-trade alliance upon the interests of the planters? Did it enlarge their markets, increase the price of their staple, and by a golden harvest to them seem to compensate for the universal ruin in which it had involved the people of the North? We will see. Had cotton manufactures in this country been fostered, the manufacturers of England and America would have been competitors in the cotton market, and, as competition among buyers ever does, would have maintained the price of that commodity. But the mad pursuit of cheap food for slaves had destroyed competition for the planters' product. Their policy had given England and her continental rivals a monopoly of the markets of the world for cotton goods. They had made England, to whose ports the fabricants of Europe went for their supply, their only customer; and she, having an immense accumulated capital which yielded but small interest, while they were needy debtors compelled to borrow, and often at any rate of interest, found herself in a condition to control the price of their commodity. Perceiving the vast relative importance of a continued supply of cheap cotton to an immediate return of interest on the capital involved in one year's supply, the English merchants accumulated cotton to an extent that enabled them to decline further immediate purchases from those who were always in debt to their factors, and whose necessities would soon compel them to sell at any price. And the author from whom I have quoted so extensively gives us, on page 72 of the volume, the legitimate result of the folly of the chief American party to the tripartite alliance in favor of free trade, when he says:

"Cotton, up to the date when this controversy had been fairly commenced, had been worth, in the English market, an average price of from 29 7-10 to 43 4-10 cents per pound; but at this period a wide-spread and ruinous depression occurred, cotton in 1826 having fallen in England as low as 11 9-10 to 18 9-10 cents per pound."

Thus had free trade, the reign of which the Democratic party is endeavoring to restore, accomplished its mission in the United States. Commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, involving the merchant, the artisan, the farmer, and the planter, were all prostrate and at the mercy of the capitalists of Great Britain, whose selfishness is only equalled by that of the class whose arrogance and unreasoning will had thus subjected the entire people of our country to their control.

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE ON THE POOR WHITES OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. Chairman, having ascertained the result of the planters' free-trade policy upon their own interests and those of the people of the North, let us contemplate the condition of the masses of the people of the cotton States. I will not detain you by any reference to that of the slaves and free people of color. Other occasions will be more fitting for that. But on nearly one million square miles of territory which the planters regarded as their exclusive domain, were some six or eight million people designated as "poor" or "mean whites," to whom are accorded all the rights of citizenship, and I will inquire whether their interests had been promoted by this policy, otherwise so unmitigatedly selfish? Let us, in contemplating their condition for a few moments, do it, not from our stand-point, but through the eyes of southern men.

Mr. Tarver, of Missouri, in the course of a paper on Domestic Manufactures in the South and West, published in 1847, says:

"The free population of the South may be divided into two classes—the slaveholder and the non-slaveholder. I am not aware that the relative numbers of these two classes have ever been ascertained in any of the States, but I am satisfied that the non-slaveholders far outnumber the slaveholders—perhaps by three to one. In the more southern portion of this region, the non-slaveholders possess, generally, but very small means, and the land which they possess is almost universally poor, and so sterile that a scanty subsistence is all that can be derived from its cultivation; and the more fertile soil, being in the possession of the slaveholder, must ever remain out of the power of those who have none."

*"This state of things is a great drawback and bears heavily upon and depresses the moral energies of the poorer classes." * * * "The acquisition of a respectable position in the scale of wealth appears so difficult, that they decline the hopeless pursuit, and many of them settled down into habits of idleness, and become the almost passive subjects of all its consequences. And I lament to say that I have observed of late years that an evident deterioration is taking place in this part of the population, the younger portion of it being less educated, less industrious, and in every point of view less respectable, than their ancestors."*

Governor Hammond, when addressing the South Carolina Institute in 1850, spoke of this portion of the people of the South when he said:

"They obtain a precarious subsistence by occasional jobs, by hunting, by fishing, by plundering fields or folds, and too often by what is in its effects far worse—trading with slaves, and seducing them to plunder for their benefit."

William Gregg, Esq., when addressing the same Institute in 1851, said:

*"From the best estimate that I have been able to make, I put down the white people, who ought to work, and who do not, or who are so employed as to be wholly unproductive to the State, at one hundred and twenty-five thousand." * * * "By this it appears that but one fifth of the present poor whites of our State would be necessary to operate one million spindles." * * * "I have long been under the impression, and every day's experience has strengthened my convictions, that the evils exist in the wholly neglected condition of this class of persons. Any man who is an observer of things could hardly pass through our country without being struck with the fact that all the capital, enterprise, and intelligence is employed in directing slave labor; and the consequence is that a large portion of our poor white people are wholly neglected, and are suffered to while away their existence in a state but one step in advance of the Indian of the forest."*

Hon. J. H. Lumpkin, of Georgia, in a paper on the Industrial Regeneration of the South, published in 1852, in advocacy of manufacturing establishments which had been attempted in Georgia, and the establishment of which had been resisted on the ground that they would become hot-beds of crime and endanger the safety of slavery, said:

*"It is objected that these manufacturing establishments will become the hot-beds of crime." * * * "But I am by no means ready to concede that our poor, degraded, half-fed, half-clothed, and ignorant population—without Sabbath schools or any other kind of instruction, mental or moral, or without any just appreciation of character—will be injured by giving them employment which will bring them under the oversight of employers who will inspire them with self-respect by taking an interest in their welfare."*

Down to that time free trade had certainly done but little to bless the poor white people of the South. Nor does it seem from recent descriptions, and from our observation of them in military prisons and hospitals, to have materially benefited them down to the present day. J. K. Gilmore, Esq., "Edmund Kirke," in his discourse on the social and political characteristics of the southern whites, before the Jersey City Literary Association, estimated the number known as the "mean whites" at over four millions, and described them as "herding together in sparse communities and gleaning a sorry subsistence from hunting, fishing, and poaching, in the mountain districts of Virginia, upper Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and in the sand hills of North Carolina and the barrens of Tennessee, and throughout the rest of the South; as hovering around the borders of large plantations, quartering themselves upon the 'chivalry,' stealing the deer from their forests and the hams from their smoke-houses." He said they were tolerated by the planters for the two hundred thousand votes they gave for slavery and the mad theories of the planters, and added, "They are far below the slaves in morals and civilization; are indolent, shiftless, thieving lying; given to whisky-drinking, snuff-dipping, clay-eating, incest, and all manner of social vices. Not one in a thousand of them can read; not one in ten thousand can write;" and he said that he "had met many who had never seen a book or newspaper, and some who had never heard of a Bible or a spelling-book."

Mr. B. C. Truman, an accredited correspondent of that journal, in a letter to the New York Times, dated Montgomery, Alabama, October 23, 1885, said:

"There is a class of beings in all the southern States known as poor whites. The little monosyllabic adjective does not give the faintest idea of these things with bodies and souls. How under the heavens they live is a question for the philanthropist, if indeed that paragon of benevolence has ever visited the region in which they exist—the 'homes' of the poor whites. In a visit to Spanish Fort a few days ago in company with a naval officer we stopped at the 'shebang' of one of these species. Most of these poor whites are natives. The individual whom we called upon, however, was a Scandinavian, but had lived in the place we found him for thirty years. For a long time he made his living by manufacturing turpentine; but the trees ran out years ago, and since then he has lived upon what he has raised, buying nothing but sugar and coffee, for which he traded chickens and eggs. His wife was of the regular mold, lean and long, with seven little children by her side, and a pipe in her mouth. I told her I was a newspaper correspondent, and she did not know what that was. I endeavored to explain, and found that she did not know what a newspaper was, and yet she resides within twenty miles of Mobile. The husband could not read or write his name, but could drink like a fish. Both husband and wife had on wooden shoes, while the children exhibited no feet covering except what nature had provided for them.

"Throughout the southern portion of Alabama, upon both sides of the river, is what is known as the 'piney woods country.' It is one of the most barren sections I have ever seen. Neither corn nor cotton will grow to any extent. Sweet potatoes are the chief product, and this vegetable and bacon, and a little corn bread, form the bill of fare morning, noon, and night all the year round. These people are scattered all through these piney woods, and live in log huts which in a way protect them from the tempestuous weather and violent storms of wind and rain which howl through this barren waste during certain periods of the year. Oh, how I pity these poor beings who have been the recipients of uncounted woes and unheard-of sufferings during the long, long years of African slavery!"

And Dixon, the traveling correspondent of the Boston Daily Advertiser, whose admirable letters prove him to be a keen observer and faithful reporter, writing from Fort Valley, Georgia, November 15, said:

"Whether the North Carolina 'dirt-eater,' or the South Carolina 'sand-hiller,' or the Georgia 'cracker,' is lowest in the scale of human existence would be difficult to say. The ordinary plantation negro seemed to me, when I first saw him in any numbers, at the very bottom of not only probabilities, but also possibilities, so far as they affect human relations; but these specimens of the white race must be credited with having reached a yet lower depth of squalid and and beastly wretchedness. However poor or ignorant or unclean or improvident he may be, I never yet found a negro who had not at least a vague desire for a better condition, an undefined longing for something called freedom, a shrewd instinct of self-preservation. These three ideas, or, let me say, shadows of ideas, do not make the creature a man, but they lift him out of the bounds of brutelike. The Georgia 'cracker,' as I have seen him since leaving Milledgeville, seems to me to lack not only all that the negro does, but also even the desire for a better condition, and the vague longing for an enlargement of his liberties and his rights. I walked out into the country back of Albany and Andersonville, when at those places, and into the country back of Fort Valley this morning; and on each occasion I fell in with three or four of these 'cracker' families. Such filthy poverty, such foul ignorance, such idiotic imbecility, such bestial instinct, such groveling desires, such mean longings, you would question my veracity as a man if I were to paint the pictures I have seen! Moreover, no trick of words can make plain the scene in and around one of these habitations; no fertility of language can embody the simple facts for a northern mind; and the case is one in which even seeing itself is scarcely believing. Time and effort will lead the negro up to intelligent manhood; but I almost doubt if it will be possible to ever lift this 'white trash' into respectability."

Sir, is not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] mistaken in asserting that free trade "is the true theory of government," and can a policy which produces such results as I have depicted be wise? Can we rely on it to pay the interest on our debt, to meet the pensions we owe to those who have been disabled in our service, or to the widows and children, or aged and dependent parents, of those who have laid down their lives in our cause? Such free trade as he advocates can produce but one result; and that is bankruptcy, personal, corporate, State, and national. It is against the laws of nature and the providence of God. It involves as a necessary consequence idleness for one half the year to all, and for all the year to many of our people who would find adequate and remunerative employment under a system of diversified labor.

HOW ENGLAND ESTABLISHED HER SUPREMACY.

The propositions I have enunciated are not deduced from our experience alone. All history affirms them. Other nations have tried free trade and ever with the same result. England, the workshop of the world and mistress of the seas as she proclaims herself, tried it, and from the time of Alfred to that of Edward the Confessor, sold her skins for a sixpence, and bought back the tails for a shilling, by exchanging her unwrought wool for Dutch and Flemish clothing; and the question as to how population might be prevented from exceeding the ability of the land to feed the people perplexed her rulers throughout the long period.

Even so late as the thirty-sixth year of Elizabeth's reign a law was enacted against "the erecting and maintaining of cottages," which, after reciting that "great inconveniences have been found by experience to grow by erecting and building of great numbers and multitudes of cottages which are daily more and more increased in many parts of this realm" enacts that no such tenement shall be erected unless four acres of land be attached to it. And Charles I, in 1630, issued a proclamation "against building houses on new foundations in London or Westminster, or within three miles of the city or king's palaces." This proclamation also forbade the receiving of inmates in the houses which would multiply the inhabitants to such an excessive number that they could neither be governed nor fed. The population of England has quadrupled since then, and her modern capitalists, regarding labor as raw material, maintain a supply in sufficient excess of the demand to cheapen it to the lowest point, to which end the British Islands raise a quarter of a million of people, chiefly Irish, for annual exportation, feeding them in their unproductive infancy and childhood; yet the English people are better fed, clothed, housed, and paid than they ever were before.

The change has been wrought by the diversification of her industry, which has been accomplished by so legislating as to set at work all the poor of England with the growth of her own lands; and the contrast which Ireland presents, of years of famine and an industrious people, whose attachment to their native land is intense, fleeing by millions from the homes of their childhood and the graves of their ancestors, is the result of that one-sided free trade which England has forced upon her since the Union, by which her woolen, worsted, silk, cotton, and linen factories have been destroyed. Protected by her legislation of 1783, these and other branches of diversified industry were prosperous and her people contented at the date of the Union. But English free trade having done its work nothing is now of so little value in Ireland as an able-bodied laborer with a good appetite. Let him who would understand the causes of the miseries of the Irish people and the depopulation of their country read the thirteenth chapter of Henry C. Carey's Slave Trade, Domestic and Foreign. It is a brief story but pregnant with instruction.

I cannot tell, sir, when England first determined to abandon dependence on the production and exportation of raw materials, but find by reference to McCallagh's Industrial History, page 74, that in 1337 she passed an act imposing

"A duty of forty shillings per sack on all wool exported by native merchants and sixty shillings on all exported by foreigners. The next year a Parliament was held at Westminster that went still further in the same direction, enacting that no wool of English growth should be transported beyond seas, and that all cloth-workers should be received, from whatever parts they should come, and fit places should be assigned them with divers liberties and privileges, and that they should have a certain allowance from the king until they might be in a way of living by their trade."

While England remained a purely agricultural country her capitalists encountered the difficulties which those of the South have to overcome, and Wade, in his History of the Middle and Working Classes, page 31, says:

"In the year 1376 we have evidence of a strong disposition to vagrancy among laborers, in a complaint of the House of Commons that masters are obliged to give their servants high wages to prevent their running away; that many of the runaways turned beggars and lived idle lives in cities and boroughs, although they have sufficient bodily strength to gain a livelihood if willing to work, and that the chief part turned out sturdy rogues, infesting the kingdom with frequent robberies."

There are those who utter such complaints in our days, and especially deplore the fact that they "are compelled to give their servants high wages to prevent their running away." At a meeting of the planters of Marlboro' district, South Carolina, the proceedings of which I find reported at length, and properly attested, in the Charleston Daily News of December 9, the following, with many like resolutions, were adopted:

"Resolved, That, if inconsistent with the views of the authorities to remove the military, we express the opinion that the plan of the military to compel the freedman to contract with his former owner, when desired by the latter, is wise, prudent, and absolutely necessary.

"Resolved, That we, the planters of the district, pledge ourselves not to contract with any freedman unless he can produce a certificate of regular discharge from his former owner.

"Resolved, That under no circumstances whatsoever will we rent land to any freedmen, nor will we permit them to live on our premises as employees.

"Resolved, That no system can be devised for the present which can secure success where the discipline and management of the freedman is entirely taken out of the hands of the planter, and we invoke the authorities to recognize this fact, which cannot but be apparent to them.

"Resolved, That we request the military to cease the habit of making negroes act as couriers, sheriffs, and constables, to serve writs and notices upon planters—a system so destructive to good order and discipline."

It is evident that neither the thunders of Gillmore's "swamp angel," nor the howl of her ponderous shells, had sufficed to awaken these somnolent gentlemen to consciousness of the fact that the fourteenth century had passed in the Palmetto State.

Englishmen in those early days exhibited the same elements of character as the negroes of our days, showing that however the complexions of races may differ, the impulses and yearnings of humanity are the same in all times and among the children of all climes. Each man embraces the elements of perfect manhood and the germ of every human faculty and emotion; and the Afro-American, in his new-found freedom, desires, as did the English laborer of the fourteenth century, to work for whom he pleases, at what he feels he can work best, and in the field which will give him the amplest reward.

Slight as the stimulants applied to British manufacturing industry by parliamentary protection had then been, they caused the landholders to manifest as much anxiety for despotic control over the laboring people as do the pardoned rebels of the South; and Wade tells us that the complaints of the Commons in 1406 furnish evidence of the competition which had commenced between rural and manufacturing industry at that day, and that—

"To avoid the statutes passed some years before for compelling those who had been brought up to the plow till they were twelve years of age to continue in husbandry all their lives, agricultural laborers had recourse to the expedient of sending their children into cities and boroughs, and binding them apprentices when they were under that age; and that further, in order to counteract this, it was enacted that no person, unless possessed of land of a rental of twenty shillings a year should bind children of any age apprentices to any trade or mystery within a city, but that the children should be brought up in the occupation of their parents, or other business suited to their conditions."

But even in those dark days the British Government seems to have been more enlightened than they who claim the right to legislate for the South, or Brevet Brigadier General Fullerton, late Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau at New Orleans; for it provided that such children were nevertheless to be allowed to be sent to a school in any part of the kingdom; which their proposed legislation and his arbitrary orders for the government of the laboring people of Louisiana would effectually prohibit.

These stupid parliamentary restrictions on the freedom of laborers were not to endure forever, and the progress of England in the development of her resources has been marked by a constantly-growing system of protection, not always judicious, sometimes infringing the rights of the subject, but tending constantly to build up the power of the kingdom, increase the material comfort of the subject, and give her ascendancy over the nations of the world.

In 1727 Dean Swift, appealing to the Irish people in behalf of Ireland, said:

"One cause of a country's thriving is the industry of the people in working up all their native commodities to the last; another, the convenience of safe ports and havens to carry out their goods, as much manufactured, and bring those of others as little manufactured; as the nature of mutual commerce will allow; another, the disposition of the people of the country to wear their own manufactures and import as little clothing, furniture, food, or drink as they can conveniently live without."

These were not abstract notions with him, for by that time England had become thoroughly protective in her policy, and was increasing in population, wealth, and power; while Ireland, though not wholly disregarding the necessity of protecting her own workmen and developing her resources, exhibited a tendency to be governed by that plausible but shallowest of economical sophisms which teaches that it is wise, regardless of all other circumstances and conditions, to buy where we can buy for least money and sell where we can sell for most, and was sinking in the scale of national consideration. How protective England had become, is illustrated by the fact that from having for many centuries exchanged her raw wool for manufactured cloths, she had in 1600 prohibited the exportation of unmanufactured wool. This prohibition continued till 1825. And to protect her silk manufacturers, from 1765 to 1826, she prohibited the importation of silk goods manufactured in other countries, and confirmed the parliamentary prohibition by a reservation in the treaty of commerce concluded with France in 1786. She also prohibited the export of tools and machines used in various branches of manufactures. In 1696 she prohibited by special act of Parliament the exportation of Lee's stocking-frame—a machine invented nearly a century before. She also prohibited by various acts the exportation of certain machinery used in woolen, silk, cotton, and linen manufactures. Such favor did protection to English labor find that her laws prohibiting exportation were made to embrace presses or dies for iron buttons, engines for covering whips, tools for punching glass; in fact, anything for which it was thought worth while on the part of any class of manufacturers or mechanics to seek protection at the hands of the Legislature by securing Englishmen a monopoly of the implements required for the production of their goods.

And when, in 1824, a commission, created to inquire into the expediency of repealing these prohibitions, reported generally in favor of the repeal, it was unable to recommend their unconditional abrogation, but qualified the suggestion by recommending that the Privy Council should continue to exercise their discretion in permitting the exportation of such tools and machinery then prohibited as might appear to them not likely to be prejudicial to the trade or manufactures of the United Kingdom, "because it is possible that circumstances may exist which may render a prohibition to export certain tools and machines used in some particular manufactures expedient." To justify even this conditional repeal the commission set forth the advantages England had derived from the protection of her infant or feeble industries in the following language:

"Placed beyond all comparison at the head of civilization as regards manufacturing skill, with capital far more ample than is possessed by any other people, with cheap and inexhaustible supplies of iron and fuel, and with institutions every way favorable to the development of the industry and ingenuity of her citizens, she must always be able at least to maintain her superiority of position where circumstances are in other respects equal, and be ready to turn to the utmost advantage every improvement which may reach her in common with her less powerful rivals."

It was not, we perceive, until by adequate protection to her labor she had kept the balance of trade in her favor long enough to make capital so abundant as to secure a steady and ample supply of money at low rates of interest; and by setting all her people to work on the growth of her lands had trained artisans and accumulated an abundance of superior machinery, which had paid for itself by profits on its use, that England was willing to admit the labor of the world to compete with that employed in her varied industries.

Nor had she resorted to these devices alone in her progress to this assured position, for an English writer, Porter, on the Progress of the Nation, says:

"Previous to 1825 the jealousy of our Legislature in regard to the progress of foreign manufactures was extended so far as to interfere even with the natural right of working artisans to transfer their industry to countries where it could be most profitably exerted. Any man who had acquired a practical knowledge of manufacturing processes was thereby rendered a prisoner in his own country, and not only might the arm of the law be interposed to prevent his quitting his native shores, but heavy penalties were imposed on all persons who should abet the expatriation of one of our artisans."

ENGLAND PREACHES BUT DOES NOT PRACTICE FREE TRADE.

These, however, were not the most effective means by which England has protected her capital and augmented her power. While prohibiting the exportation of tools and machines, and restraining her skilled workmen from emigrating, she was, from so early as 1837, as we have already seen, encouraging by special grants and privileges the artisans of other countries to bring with them the implements of their industry and employ them within her limits. Her policy is unchanged. The free trade she proclaims is theoretical, plausible, and delusive. Her revenue laws, and her treaty stipulations, however recent, with France, Portugal, the United States, and other countries, if they treat of the question of trade, guard the manufactures of England against the competition of those of any foreign nation.

The world hailed her welcoming of foreign grain as a step toward really reciprocal free trade. Her statesmen, however, saw in it a master-stroke by which her manufacturing supremacy would be maintained. Sir Robert Peel knew that the manufactures of England were the source of her power; that cheap food for her laborers was an element of cheap production; that so long as other nations would employ her to manufacture their raw materials it was immaterial whether she raised any grain at all; and that every acre of her arable land not required to raise green vegetables and the soft fruits which do not bear transportation, might be appropriated to sheep walks and pasturage, and, through her well-protected and diversified industry she would draw from the prairies of the United States, the banks of the Nile, and the shores of the Baltic a supply of food far more generous than the insular dimensions of England could possibly yield.

Her policy is to undersell all others. To do this she must depress the wages of labor, and to accomplish this she must provide her laboring people at the lowest possible prices with the simple and coarse fare on which her low wages compel them to live. To have retained the duties on grain would have been, in so far, to tax raw materials, as we do, and she is too astute for that. She wants cheap food for her slaves as the southern planters did for theirs, and gets it as they did by forcing British free trade on the American people. She is the foe of the working-men of every country, and impairs their wages by depressing those of the men upon whose toil her own power depends. She protects the capital of England as we wish to protect the labor, ingenuity, and enterprise of the American people. Her aim is to be the workshop of the world, and to bind the people of all other lands to the rude employments of unskilled agriculture.

The agricultural interest resisted the repeal of the corn laws. To admit grain duty free it was said would ruin the farmers and lessen the market and taxable value of the land of the kingdom. But her experience has demonstrated the laws of social science and proved the harmony of interests by increasing the agricultural products of England in a ratio equal to the increased amount of her import of raw material and the extent of her home market.

FREE TRADE EXHAUSTS LAND AND IMPOVERISHES FARMERS.

I have said, sir, that a nation cannot prosper by commerce and agriculture alone; and our bitter experience of wasted lands and oft-recurring bankruptcy contrasted with the steadily increasing affluence of the agriculturists of England confirms the fact. Let us examine this question. We boast ourselves an agricultural people and are content to look to nations beyond the seas for the fabrics we consume and a market for our products. Not having a home market we cannot diversify our crops, but must confine ourselves to the production of those commodities which will keep long and bear transportation: Wheat, corn, pork, cotton, rice, tobacco, and hemp are our great staples, and our crops, omitting those produced within a radius around the large cities, narrowing as they diminish in importance, diminish from year to year, while those of England, stimulated and varied by a home market, increase so wonderfully that science pauses before declaring that she has yet ascertained the measure of wealth a single well-fed acre under scientific culture will yield. The virgin soil of America gives back to the farmer at least thirty bushels of wheat to the acre; and in his early crops he does not fear the Hessian fly, the midge, weevil, or any insect-destroyer of grain. In the old wheat-growing States remote from cities, the same amount of labor bestowed upon an acre is rewarded by but seven or at best ten bushels, and the farmer regards himself as lucky whose fields are not visited once in three years by some of the deadly foes to wheat—the insects that live and swarm upon the diseased juices of feeble grain, the offspring of famished soil. The most carefully-prepared tables I have been able to find give twelve bushels or less as the average wheat crop per acre of America.

In England the fields are enriched by the bones, woolen rags, and other nutritious manures which we export; the grain crop is followed by a green crop, or those vegetables, the tops of which absorb from the atmosphere and return to the earth the aliment abstracted by cereals, and the amount of labor which, when England was a purely agricultural country, drew but from twelve to fifteen bushels of wheat from an acre, is now rewarded by from thirty-eight to forty-three bushels, or the equivalent thereof in roots for the sustenance of man and beast. Under our exhausting process of dragging or torturing from the earth the last elements of the white crop, and our exportation of stimulants and manures, our very fruit crop is disappearing. The diseased trees of the orchard, the apple, the pear, the plum, blossom and bring forth fruit, and the borer, the curculio, and others of the insect tribe that are sent to scourge us into good husbandry, revel in it, and it falls before maturity as if to give some subsistence to the starved stem that gave it its sickly life. This is no fancy sketch. In endeavoring to sell in the dearest money markets and buy where we can buy for least money, we have sold the very life of our acres and mortgaged ourselves to a class of middle-men, mostly foreigners, who take the results of our industry as the price of carrying our products to market and bringing us the few and inferior commodities—the tails—we receive in return for our skins. Our life is an inevitable game of cross purposes. Ambitious of commercial importance we produce only raw materials and can have no commerce, but must enhance the maritime power of our rival by employing her ships, sailors, and merchants to do our carrying; and while eager to keep down our steadily-increasing foreign indebtedness we ship our least bulky but most potent manures in the same British vessels that carry away our cotton, corn, and gold. The real balance of trade is ever against us, and our debts—commercial, corporate, and State—are ever increasing. Let us mine gold and silver never so fast, we can keep none of it. Our suspensions of specie payments are periodical. Protective England maintains the balance of trade as steadily in her favor; and her statisticians calculate that her annual accumulation of surplus capital has attained the enormous dimensions of £50,000,000 or $250,000,000. England offers no investments for this annual increase, and the managers of the railroads that carry our crops over our own soil to the sea-board for shipment extort exorbitant freights to enable them to pay interest on bonds sold at low rates to foreign holders, or pay large dividends to British capitalists who, in default of other investments offering profits equally great, have taken the stock. Without manufactures we can have neither commerce nor commercial marine; for a purely agricultural people, depending on foreign nations for a limited market, have nothing with which to freight vessels to the general markets of the world, and no assorted commodities to exchange for those that would enrich the country and build up upon the sea-board commercial emporiums with native citizens and American interests.

But, sir, let us look a little more closely at the effect of the mad theories propounded by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] on the land of the country. Professor Henry gave it as his opinion, some years ago, (and I believe it to be true to-day,) that there was more wealth invested in our soil in fertilizing matter at the moment this country was discovered by Columbus than there is at present above the surface in improvements and all other investments. Ohio, justly proud of her comparatively superior American agriculture, was admonished by John H. Klippart, Esq., corresponding secretary of her State Board of Agriculture in 1860, that her staple crop, wheat, was annually decreasing in its yield per acre; that in less than fifty years the average product was reduced from thirty to less than fifteen bushels per acre, and that unless her farmers turned their attention, and that very soon, to the renovation of their wheat lands, even Ohio would soon be one of the non-wheat-producing States. During the first five years of the last decade her corn crop averaged 36 $\frac{1}{2}$ bushels to the acre, while during the last five years of the decade its average had fallen to 32 $\frac{1}{2}$ %. It matters little, practically, whether a man sell his acres or sell only their vital principle. It would have been better, could we have done it, that we had exported our acres in all their breadth and depth than to have extracted from them as we have, and exported or burned as fuel their productive power. We should then have seen that that market in which goods can be bought for the least money is not always the cheapest, and realized how fearful a price we were paying for the tails of the skins we had sold so recklessly.

I have referred to Ohio as an example, not because her case is exceptional, but because if it be exceptional it is in favor of her better than average American husbandry.

The South has been less desolated by war than by long-continued unreciprocal free trade with England. The ravages of war can soon be repaired. Houses, canals, and railroads can soon be rebuilt. Villages, as unimportant as those of the South, (and in this I embrace her cities all other than New Orleans,) are things of very rapid growth in countries where men are free to exercise their skill or enterprise, and industry is well rewarded. But who shall restore her waste lands? War was not the demon that blasted them; it was the free trade that England imposes on semi-civilized nations; it was the desire to create a monopoly of the cotton and sugar trade; it was the belief that a poor and ambitious people whose expenditures anticipated their annual crop could be victorious in a contest with a wealthy people whose diversified industry gave them the control of all markets, and whose surplus capital enabled them to choose their own time and place for purchasing. I will not describe what I have seen in the South, or take the reports brought by northern men. Let southern men describe the condition of their plantations.

A southern journal, which is quoted by Carey in his Social Science, but of which the name is not given, says:

"An Alabama planter says that cotton has destroyed more than earthquakes or volcanic eruptions. Witness the red hills of Georgia and South Carolina, which have produced cotton till the last dying gasp of the soil forbade any further attempt at cultivation; and the land, turned out to nature, reminds the traveler, as he views the dilapidated condition of the country, of the ruins of ancient Greece."

Dr. Daniel Lee, in his Progress of Agriculture, in the United States Patent Office Report for 1852, says:

"Cotton culture presents one feature which we respectfully commend to the earnest consideration of southern statesmen and planters, and that is the constantly increasing deterioration of the soil devoted mainly to the production of this important crop. Already this evil has attained a fearful magnitude; and under the present common practice it grows a little faster than the increase of cotton bales at the South. Who can say when or where this ever-augmenting exhaustion of the natural resources of the cotton-growing States is to end, short of their ruin?"

De Bow, in his Resources of the South, published in 1852, says:

"The native soil of middle Georgia is a rich argillaceous loam, resting on a firm, clay foundation. In some of the richer counties nearly all the lands have been cut down and appropriated to tillage; a large maximum of which have been worn out, leaving a desolate picture for the traveler to behold—decaying tenements, red old hills, stripped of their native growth and virgin soil, and washed into deep gullies, with here and there patches of Bermuda grass and stunted pine shrubs, struggling for a scanty subsistence on what was once one of the richest soils of America."

Governor Hammond, in an address before the South Carolina Institute in 1849, after presenting the same class of facts, said:

"These are not mere paper calculations, or the gloomy speculations of a brooding fancy. They are illustrated and sustained by facts, current facts of our own day, within the knowledge of every one of us. The process of impoverishment has been visibly and palpably going on step by step with the decline in the price of cotton."

Clement C. Clay, of Alabama, speaking in the United States Senate, said:

"I can show you, with sorrow, in the older portions of Alabama, in my native county of Madison, the sad memorials of the artless and exhausting culture of cotton. Our small planters, after taking the cream of their lands, unable to restore them by rest, manures, or otherwise, are going further West and South in search of other virgin lands, which they may and will despoil and impoverish in like manner."

"In traversing that county, one will discover numerous farm-houses, once the abode of industrious and intelligent freemen, now occupied by slaves, or tenantless, deserted, and dilapidated; he will observe fields, once fertile, now unfenced, abandoned, and covered with those evil harbingers, foxtail and broom-sedge; he will see the moss growing on the moldering walls of once thrifty villages, and will find 'one only master grasp the whole domain' that once furnished happy homes for a dozen white families. Indeed a country in its infancy, where fifty years ago scarce a forest tree had been felled by the ax of the pioneer, is already exhibiting the painful signs of senility and decay apparent in Virginia and the Carolinas."

Dr. Lee, in the paper to which I have already referred, says:

"Of the land cultivated in this country, one hundred million acres are damaged to the extent of three dollars per acre per annum, or, in other words, a complete restitution of the elements of crops removed each year cannot be made short of an expense of $300,000,000."

FREE TRADE KEEPS US IN SUBJECTION TO ENGLAND'S COLONIAL POLICY.

Sir, this is a melancholy picture to contemplate—a country wasted in its youth, and its people impoverished in the midst of abounding natural riches. And, sir, what adds to its sadder character is the fact that it is not accidental—that it is not the result of Providence, save as Providence permits some men to trifle with their rights and interests and others to take advantage of their wickedness, weakness, or folly. It is the work of man; it is the result of design; it has been brought about as the end sought to be obtained by the sagacious and far-seeing legislators who have guided the counsels of Great Britain and their allies, the free trade leaders of the Democratic party of our country. The laws by which these melancholy results were produced are demonstrable, and have long been well understood. They are the golden rule as administered by selfish and perfidious England to young or feeble nations and her own colonies. They were understood by Locke when he prepared his essay on Civil Government. Dean Swift, as I have shown, expounded them when he endeavored to inspire the people of Ireland with wisdom and save to that unhappy country a future. They were understood by Andrew Gee when he published his work on Trade in 1750, and among other illustrations of his clear apprehension of them said:

"Manufactures in our American colonies should be discouraged, prohibited." * * * "We ought always to keep a watchful eye over our colonies, to restrain them from setting up any of the manufactures which are carried on in Great Britain; and any such attempts should be crushed at the beginning." * * * "Our colonies are much in the same state as Ireland was in when they began the woolen manufacture, and as their numbers increase, will fall upon manufactures for clothing themselves, if due care be not taken to find employment for them in raising such productions as may enable them to furnish themselves with all the necessaries for us." * * * "As they will have the providing rough materials to themselves, so shall we have the manufacturing of them. If encouragement be given for raising hemp, flax, &c., doubtless they will soon begin to manufacture, if not prevented. Therefore, to stop the progress of any such manufacture, it is proposed that no weaver have liberty to set up any looms, without first registering at an office, kept for that purpose." * * * "That all spinning-mills, and engines for drawing wire or weaving stockings, be put down." * * * "That all negroes be prohibited from weaving either linen or woolen, or spinning or combing wool, or working at any manufacture of iron, farther than making it into pig or bar iron. That they also be prohibited from manufacturing hats, stockings, or leather of any kind. This limitation will not abridge the planters of any liberty they now enjoy; on the contrary, it will then turn their industry to promoting and raising those rough materials." * * * "If we examine into the circumstances of the inhabitants of our plantations, and our own, it will appear that not one fourth of the product redounds to their own profit, for, out of all that comes here, they only carry back clothing and other accommodations for their families, all of which is of the merchandise and manufacture of this kingdom." * * * "All these advantages we receive by the plantations, besides the mortgages on the planters' estates and the high interest they pay us, which is very considerable."

I think, sir, that I have shown by the extracts I have made from that remarkable book, "Cotton is King," that the men of the South understood the laws of trade (certain as that of gravitation) well enough to comprehend the fact that free trade must ultimately destroy the varied interests of the North. They may not, mad with ambition as they were, have seen that the operation of the laws whose penalties they were inflicting upon others would involve them in common destruction; but that they understood the fatal operation of free trade upon the great interests of the country is apparent in every chapter of the essay from which I have quoted.

I know not, sir, whether the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has studied the laws of social science, but they have been thoroughly comprehended by the statesmen of England, and furnish the key alike to her diplomacy and legislation. Illustrative of this is the case of Portugal. In the latter part of the seventeenth century she had established manufactures of woolen goods, which were thriving, adding to the comfort and prosperity of her people, and to her own respectability and power. They, however, needed protection against the hostile capital and more fully developed industry of England, and in 1684 the Government, discovering the advantages it derived from these manufactures, resolved to protect them by prohibiting the importation of foreign fabrics of the kind. Thenceforward their increase was so rapid as to attract the attention of British capitalists, who determined upon their destruction. This was not to be accomplished at once; but, evading the technical language of the law, they manufactured articles under names and of descriptions not precisely covered by the act of prohibition, which would supply their places, and threw them, in great abundance, into the Portuguese markets. The effect upon the industry of the country was soon felt, and the Government gave its attention to the matter and prohibited the introduction of these "serges and druggets." But British capitalists were as determined that their fabrics should clothe the people of Portugal as they have since been that we should consume their cotton, woolen, steel, iron, and other goods; and what they had been unable to accomplish by the mere force of capital or by skillful evasions of Portuguese laws, they at last achieved by diplomacy. Portugal failing to perceive that England could not produce Portuguese wines, as she cannot produce American cotton, hemp, rice, tobacco, and grain, listened to the words of such diplomacy as induced us to enter into the Canadian reciprocity treaty, and subjected the energy, ingenuity, and industry of her people and the raw material of the country to the control of the Government and capitalists of England; the inducement to this step, artfully put forward by Great Britain, was that the wines of Portugal should be admitted into Great Britain at a duty one third less than that imposed on wines imported from other countries. The effect of this treaty on the industry of Portugal is narrated by an English writer, who says:

"Before the treaty our woolen cloths, cloth serges, and cloth druggets were prohibited in Portugal. They had set up fabrics there for making cloth, and proceeded with very good success, and we might justly apprehend they would have gone on to erect other fabrics until at last they had served themselves with every species of woolen manufactures. The treaty takes off all prohibitions and obliges Portugal to admit forever all our woolen manufactures. Their own fabrics by this were perfectly ruined, and we exported £100,000 value in the single article of cloths the very year after the treaty."

"The court [of Portugal] was pestered with remonstrances from their manufacturers when the prohibition was taken off pursuant to Mr. Methuen's treaty. But the thing was passed, the treaty was ratified, and their looms were all ruined."—British Merchantmen, vol. 3, p. 233.

In the spirit of the diplomacy of Methuen was the parliamentary eloquence of Henry, now Lord Brougham, in 1815. Having described the effect of the peace of 1814, which bound continental Europe to the use of British manufactures, and produced an excessive exportation of British goods in that direction, he said:

"The peace of America has produced somewhat of the same effect, though I am very far from placing the vast exports which it occasioned upon the same footing with those to the European market the year before, both because ultimately the Americans will pay, which the exhausted state of the Continent renders very unlikely, and because it was well worth while to incur a loss upon the first exportation in order by the glut to stifle in the cradle those rising manufactures in the United States which the war has forced into existence contrary to the natural course of things."

Though I should not pause here, I cannot abstain from asking the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] whether he is ready to permit "British capitalists" to glut our markets and stifle in the cradle the rising manufactures which the late war has called into existence? In further proof that they will do so and throw the workmen engaged in our furnaces, forges, factories, and workshops out of employment if we do not protect them, let me add that the commission appointed under the provisions of the act of 5th and 6th Victoria, chapter ninety-nine, showed how well it understood that the supremacy of Great Britain depends on the maintenance at whatever cost of her manufacturing supremacy, when, in the report to Parliament in 1854, it said:

"I believe that the laboring classes generally, in the manufacturing districts of this country, and especially in the iron and coal districts, are very little aware of the extent to which they are often indebted for their being employed at all to the immense losses which their employers voluntarily incur in bad times, in order to destroy foreign competition, and to gain and keep possession of foreign markets. Authentic instances are well known of employers having in such times carried on their work at a loss amounting in the aggregate to three or four hundred thousand pounds in the course of as many years. If the efforts of those who encourage the combinations to restrict the amount of labor, and to produce strikes, were to be successful for any length of time, the great accumulations of capital and the large number of workmen employed in the iron and coal districts would be made which enable a few of the most wealthy capitalists to overwhelm all foreign competition in times of great depression, and thus to clear the way for the whole trade to step in when prices revive, and to carry on a great business before foreign capital can again accumulate to such an extent as to be able to establish a competition in prices with any chance of success. The large capitals of this country are the great instruments of warfare against the competing capitalists of foreign countries, and are the most essential instruments now remaining by which our manufacturing supremacy can be maintained; the other elements—cheap labor, abundance of raw materials, means of communication, and skilled labor—being rapidly in process of being realized."

FRANCE, ENGLAND, PRUSSIA, SHODDY.

Nor, sir, have other nations failed to discover that social life is not subject to chance, or to enforce what are now termed the laws of social science. Indeed, the more sagacious and powerful nations have been compelled in self-defense to do what we—grand as are the dimensions and resources of our country—must do or be forever dependent and subject to ever more frequently-recurring periods of bankruptcy, private, corporate, State, and national.

Carlyle's brilliant word-painting depicts the horrors that flowed from contempt for the value of labor in France, and the historian of the rebellion just crushed will portray those which flowed from our disregard of the rights of the laboring people of our country. Had Louis XIV appreciated the value and national power of the skilled industry of France he would not have revoked the edict of Nantes, upon which, says Hume:

"Above half a million of the most useful and industrious subjects deserted France, and exported, together with immense sums of money, those arts and manufactures which had chiefly tended to enrich that country." * * * "Near fifty thousand refugees passed over into England."

Since the days of Colbert, however, with the exception of a brief term during which she adhered to the stipulations of a "reciprocity treaty," into which England inveigled her, France has protected her industry by prohibitory acts, by bounties or concessions, and by high protective duties. Her present astute ruler and the British Government have recently attempted to dazzle and mislead other nations with theories of free trade which neither was willing to carry into operation; but the tariff act prepared by M. Chevalier, after conference with Mr. Cobden, who, in his desire to improve the condition of the laboring classes of England by securing them cheap food, was led to adopt all the fallacies of the school of free traders, is perhaps the most scientifically protective revenue law ever devised.

France permits none of her raw material, which is not absolutely in excess of her demand for food or fabrics, to be exported; nor will she admit into her ports any article that may come in competition with her industry without requiring it to pay her and her people adequate compensation for the injury such admission might inflict. A recent illustration of this is before us. The free-trade papers are announcing that France has determined to admit raw whalebone free of duty. They cannot, however, tell us that she has consented to admit foreign hops on the same terms; for while inviting cargoes of whalebone to her ports, she has rejected the application for the free admission of hops. She welcomes the product of the American whaler, for whalebone enters into an infinite number of her manufactures. She has no domestic source from which she can derive the article; and the duty upon it, as upon any raw material, was a tax upon her manufacturers, or a bounty to their rivals. She therefore remits the duty for the same reason that she taxes hops. She produces much wine, and but little beer; and her own soil and labor furnish her with an adequate supply of hops for all uses within her limits. To admit them would be to injure her agriculturists, and, perchance, to stimulate an appetite for a beverage that might injure the markets for French wines.

We ship in the same vessel our wheat, and the bones, rags, and other refuse matter which would, were our own industry broadly diversified, after application to many purposes of use and pleasure, restore to the earth the elements extracted from it by the tons of wheat which they accompany to foreign markets. These France, England, and Germany guard most sedulously, and in a pamphlet now before me, entitled "The History of the Shoddy Trade, its Rise, Progress, and Present Position," published in London in 1860, I find that in England—

"Materials regarded at one time as almost worthless, are converted, by the improved processes of manual labor and machinery, into valuable elements of textile manufactures. The seams or refuse of rags are used, after lying to rot, for the purpose of manuring arable land, particularly the hop grounds of Kent and adjacent counties, and are also made into flock partially for bedding and stuffing uses. They are, moreover, (which seems strange indeed,) manufactured into a chemical substance, namely, prussiate of potash, a valuable agent in dyeing. Shoddy dust, too, which is the dirt emitted from rags and shoddy in their processes, is useful as tillage in like manner with the waste which falls under scribbling-engines. The latter is saturated with oil, in which consists, mainly, the fertilizing property. Waste is of more value than dust for farming purposes, the former having been generally about double the price of the latter; but dust has of late increased in value so as to be well nigh equal to waste. A large quantity of these materials is annually sent from this district (the West Riding of York) into Kent and other counties to till the soil. Shoddy dust is useful in other respects than as tillage. It is now even carefully preserved in separate colors and applied in the manufacture of flock paper-hangings, which are the best description of this article. Not a single thing belonging to the rag and shoddy system is valueless or useless. There are no accumulations or mountains of debris to take up room or disfigure the landscape; all, good, bad, and indifferent, are beneficially appropriated."

Of these valuable materials this little work shows me that America furnishes England more than any other nation, and that in point of quality her woolen rags are the best, even better than those derived from the city of London; that so largely are we the consumers of the cloths manufactured in greater or less part from our own refuse matter, that a commercial crisis in this country affects every manufacturer in the shoddy districts; and that the most calamitous eras in the history of the generally thriving towns depending on this manufacture were the years immediately following 1837 and 1857, when their industry was entirely suspended by the destruction of the American market.

France, less lavish of her wealth and more careful of the welfare of her people than we, sedulously guards such elements of wealth and comfort. How sedulously, will appear from the following extract from the little work I have just quoted:

"As to rags, we have not been able to import any from France, on account of their having been prohibited as an article of export; but according to the treaty of commerce just concluded between France and England [that arranged between Chevalier and Cobden] the former has engaged to remove the prohibition, but reserves the privilege of imposing a heavy duty on rags shipped thence to this country. The amount of duty has not been fixed yet, we believe; but there are fears on our part that it will be such as to preclude either paper or woolen rags being brought over to any material extent."

The fear expressed by the writer was well founded. Shrewd men played at an intricate game when that treaty was made; and while France consented far enough to give a text upon which she and England might preach free trade to the other nations of the world, she reserved to herself the amplest power to maintain the most perfect defensive warfare between her interests and those of aggressive England.

Prior to 1844 England herself subjected rag-wool, that is, shoddy-wool prepared from rags by any other nation, to a duty of a half-penny per pound; but when other nations refused to sell her their rags in bulk, the prepared or rag-wool became the nearest approach she could obtain in adequate supply to that species of raw material, and she abolished the duty which, light as it was, favored the industry of her rivals.

Nor is Prussia behind France and England in this matter, for the same pamphlet tells me that at Berlin there are a number of manufactories of rag-wool, several of which have been established by enterprising Englishmen from the shoddy towns of Dewsbury and Batley.

"These factories," says the writer, "produce both shoddy and mungo, and appear to be successful undertakings. The principal reason why our countrymen prosecute this business at Berlin and other places in Prussia is because that Government levies a heavy duty on the exportation of rags, and permits shoddy, the manufactured article, to go out free, thus affording facilities for an export trade in rag-wool not extended to rags."

Insignificant as the territory of Prussia is in comparison with ours, the Government has found it well to insist upon Englishmen who wish to work the raw materials of the country coming with capital and machinery to furnish employment to the men, women, and children of the country with the growth of the land, and to supply agricultural stimulants and a market for agricultural products within its limits, rather than repeat the unsuccessful experiment of clothing the people in foreign goods by selling their raw material at a price fixed by a distant customer and buying it back in cloth at prices fixed by the same party. Will the American people never learn this simple lesson?

SECRET OF BONAPARTE'S POWER.

The first Napoleon said, and his words cannot be too often repeated in a republican country, a majority of whose people are dependent on their labor:

"In feudal times there was one kind of property—land; but there has grown up another—industry. They are alike entitled to the protection and defense of the Government."

And how did he attempt to protect and defend what was and ever will be almost the only property and dependence of the majority of the people—their skill and industry? Let us learn from Chaptal, his Minister of the Interior, who in his work on the Industry of France, says:

"A sound legislation on the subject of duties on imports is the true safeguard of agriculture and manufacturing industry. It countervails the disadvantages under which our manufactures labor from the condition of the price of workmanship or fuel. It shields the rising arts by prohibitions, thus preserving them from the rivalry of foreigners until they arrive at complete perfection. It tends to establish the national independence, and enriches the country by useful labor, which, as I have repeatedly said, is the principal source of wealth."

"It has been almost everywhere found that rising manufactures are unable to struggle against establishments cemented by time, nourished by numerous capitals, with a credit established by continued success, and conducted by numbers of experienced and skillful artists. We have been forced to have recourse to prohibition to ward off the competition of foreign productions."

"I go further: even at the present time, when these various species of industry are in a flourishing state, when there is nothing to desire with regard to the price or quality of our productions, a duty of but fifteen per cent, which would open the door to the competition of foreign fabrics, would shake to their foundations all the establishments which exist in France. Our stores would in a few days be crowded with foreign merchandise, which would be sold at any price in order to extinguish our industry. Our manufactures would be devoted to idleness through the impossibility of the proprietors making the same sacrifices as foreigners; and we should behold the same scenes as followed the treaty of commerce of 1786, although it was concluded on the basis of fifteen per cent."

"Cotton yarn forms the raw material of our numerous laces and calicoes. If we freely open our ports to this material, which has undergone but a single operation, behold the infallible results. One hundred million livres at present production would be destroyed for the spinning manufactures of France, because it is invested in buildings, utensils, and machinery constructed for this purpose alone; two hundred thousand persons would be deprived of employment; eighteen millions of manual labor would be lost to France, and our commerce would be deprived of one of its principal resources, which consists in the transportation of cotton and wool from Asia and America to France."

"Let it not be presumed that I deceive myself. I am well acquainted with the state of our cotton spinning and that of the two neighboring countries. In France, it is true, manual labor is cheap, but on the other side more extensive establishments, supported by large capitals, afford advantages against which it is impossible for us yet to struggle. To this must be added that the English spinning machinery has been in use for sixty years, that the proprietors are indemnified for all the expenses of their first establishment, that the profits have been converted into new capitals, whereas ours are of recent formation, and the interest of the first investment ought for a long time to be computed in all the calculations of the profits of the manufactory. The English manufacturer, reimbursed for his first investment, and possessing a large capital, is able to make sacrifices to overtake and level us, whereas the French manufacturer is destitute of defense unless protected by the tariff."

Chaptal understood as thoroughly as Brougham that England had the power, and that it was her constant policy to "stifle the infant manufactures" of other nations "in the cradle." His language is as applicable to our interests now as it was to those of France when uttered; and we can find no other safeguard for our agricultural and commercial interests than such sound legislation on the subject of duties on imports as protected the infant but rising manufactures of France.

I cannot abstain, sir, from submitting to your consideration in this connection a brief specimen of vigorous condensation from the instructive address of John L. Hayes, Esq., before the National Association of Wool Manufacturers:

"No sooner had the First Consul Bonaparte grasped with a firm hand the reins of state, than he resolved to develop upon the French soil all the elements of wealth concealed within its bosom. He wished to appropriate for France all sciences, arts, and industries. Made a member of the Institute he uttered this noble sentiment: 'The true power of the French republic should consist, above all, in its not allowing a single new idea to exist which it does not make its own.' To learn the necessities and resources of the nation, he called upon savans, painters, and artisans to adorn with their productions the vast hall of the Louvre. From this epoch a new career was opened to the industry of France, which found its most magnificent protector in the chief of the State. Napoleon said: 'Spain has twenty-five million merinos; I wish France to have a hundred millions.' To effect this, among other administrative aids, he established sixty additional sheep-folds to those of Rambouillet, where agriculturists could obtain the use of Spanish rains without expense. By the continental blockade, he closed France and the greater part of Europe against English importations; and the manufacturers of France were pushed to their utmost to supply, not only their domestic, but European consumption. They had to replace, by imitating them, the English commodities to which the people had been so long accustomed. The old routines of manufacturing were abandoned, and the reign of the emperor became, in all the industrial arts, one long series of discoveries and progress. Napoleon saw that the conquest of the industry of England was no less important than the destruction of its fleets and armies. He appealed to patriotism, as well as science and the arts, to aid him in his strife with the modern Carthage. Visiting the establishment for printing calicoes of the celebrated Oberkampf, Napoleon said to him, as he saw the perfection of the fabrics: 'We are both of us carrying on a war with England; but I think that yours, after all, is the best.' These words," says M. Randoing, "so flattering and so just, were repeated from one end of France to the other; they so inflamed the imaginations of the people that the meanest artisan, believing himself called upon to be the auxiliary of the great man, had but one thought, the ruin of England."

WHAT PROTECTION HAS DONE FOR GERMANY.

Before the establishment of the Zoll-Verein, which occurred in 1835, Germany exported raw materials. Having sold her skins for a sixpence, she bought back what few tails she could, at any price. Her laboring people were poor, and, as is now the case in Ireland, in such excess of her ability to feed and clothe them, that she was ever ready to sell a contingent to any party that might be engaged in war, and if need be to swell the ranks of both contending armies in any war. In the absence of protective duties, there was nothing of so little value to her as an able-bodied German peasant. But the establishment of that Customs-Union has changed all this. It protects her industry, and as a consequence she imports raw materials from America and all other countries that adhere to her ancient semi-barbarous policy, and exports her grain and wool condensed into broadcloth and the multifarious products of well-protected industry. The annual crop derived from her soil increases per acre steadily as that of England, and in about the ratio of the diminution of ours. Wise laws have here again demonstrated the truth that there is a harmony between the varied interests of the people of a country, and that by a wide and universal diversification of employments the welfare of each and all is advanced.

Forty years ago England had not perfected her protective system so far as to admit all raw materials free of duty, and Germany sold her thirty million pounds of raw wool, upon which she collected a duty of twelve cents a pound, part of which when manufactured into low grades of cloth she sold at immense profits in Germany. But thirty years of protection have changed all this. Germany now raises over seventy million pounds of wool, and imports very considerable quantities; and having compacted her grain and wool into fine cloths she exports them to all parts of the world. When the Zoll-Verein was formed, says Henry C. Carey,

"The total import of raw cotton and cotton yarn was about three hundred thousand cuts; but so rapid was the extension of the manufacture that in less than six years it had doubled; and so cheaply were cotton goods supplied, that a large export trade had already arisen. In 1845, when the union was but ten years old, the import of cotton and yarn had reached a million of hundred weights, and since that time there has been a large increase. The iron manufacture, also, grew so rapidly that whereas, in 1834, the consumption had been only eleven pounds per head, in 1847 it had risen to twenty-five pounds, having thus more than doubled; and with each step in this direction, the people were obtaining better machinery for cultivating the land and for converting its raw products into manufactured ones."

WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON, AND JACKSON.

In what strange contrast with this policy so fruitful of blessings has been that which we have pursued, and of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] claims President Johnson as an adherent. Opposed to privileged classes, we have legislated in the interests of but one class, and that an oligarchy; proclaiming "the greatest good of the greatest number" as our supreme desire, we have so legislated as to impair the value of labor, the only property of a majority of our people; vaunting our national independence, we have so legislated as to prevent our escape from a condition of commercial, manufacturing, and financial dependence; and while justly proud of our general intelligence, we have so legislated as to justify the manufacturing and commercial nations of the world in classing us among the semi-barbarous governments whose people, rich in natural wealth, have not the capacity to mold and transmute raw materials into articles of utility, comfort, and refinement, and in ranking the people of the United States, in their estimation, with those of Turkey, Portugal, Ireland, and the mixed races of Central and South America. The fathers of the country were, in this matter, wiser than their children. They had suffered from the rigid enforcement by Great Britain of Andrew Gee's suggestion to "keep a watchful eye over our colonies, and restrain them from setting up any of the manufactures which are carried on in Great Britain;" and they knew that if the nation they had founded was to be powerful, and its people prosperous, they must be relieved from that policy by the only means possible—the adherence to those defensive laws which would protect an infant against the aggressions of a giant. The Constitution was adopted in 1787; President Washington was inaugurated in 1789, and in his address of the 8th of January, 1790, said:

"The safety and interest of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military supplies."

And on the 15th of the same month, Congress resolved

"That it be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to propose and report to this House a proper plan or plans conformably to the recommendations of the President in his speech to both Houses of Congress, for the encouragement and promotion of such manufactures as will tend to render the United States independent of other nations for essential, particularly for military supplies."

And in 1791 Congress adopted an act for imposing duties on imports, the preamble of which contains the following language:

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported."

In a communication five years later than this, Washington said:

"Congress have repeatedly directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much importance not to insure a continuance of these efforts in every way which shall appear eligible."

And Mr. Jefferson, in his message of 1802, said that—

"To cultivate peace, maintain commerce and navigation, to foster our fisheries, and protect manufactures adapted to our circumstances, &c., are the landmarks by which to guide ourselves in all our relations."

These expressions are inconsistent with the opinions adverse to the policy of fostering manufactures in this country embodied by Jefferson in his Notes on Virginia in 1785; but he was not one of those fools who hold it a weakness to change an opinion, even under the discipline of experience; and in a letter to Mr. Benjamin Austin, dated January 9, 1816, when the subject of a protective tariff was agitated by the people and was about to be brought to the attention of Congress, said in support of his matured judgment:

"You tell me I am quoted by those who wish to continue our dependence on England for manufactures. There was a time when I might have been so quoted with more candor." * * * "We have since experienced what we did not then believe, that there exists both profligacy and power enough to exclude us from the field of interchange with other nations—that to be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist."

"He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to dependence on that foreign nation, or to be clothed in skins and to live like wild beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say that I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort; and if those who quote me as of a different opinion will keep pace with me in purchasing nothing foreign where an equivalent of domestic fabric can be obtained, without any regard to difference of price, it will not be our fault if we do not have a supply at home equal to our demand, and wrest that weapon of distress from the hand which has so long wantonly violated it."

General Jackson's oft-quoted letter to Dr. Coleman, of North Carolina, was about eight years later than that of Mr. Jefferson, and nothing that he ever wrote illustrates more admirably his strong common sense and devotion to the rights and interests of all the people of the Union which he so resolutely defended. Writing to one of that class who have been pleased to call themselves "planters," to distinguish them from the "hard-fisted farmers" of the North, upon whose interests they were then waging war, that they might secure cheap food for their slaves, he said:

"I will ask, what is the real situation of the agriculturist? Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus products? Except for cotton, he has neither a foreign nor a home market. Does not this clearly prove, when there is no market, either at home or abroad, that there is too much labor employed in agriculture, and that the channels of labor should be multiplied? Common sense points out at once the remedy. Draw from agriculture the superabundant labor; employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs, and distributing labor to a most profitable account; and benefits to the country will result. Take from agriculture in the United States six hundred thousand men, women, and children, and you at once give a home market for more breadstuffs than all Europe now furnishes us. In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of the British merchants. It is time we should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of Europe, feed our own; or else, in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall all be paupers ourselves."

MAN CANNOT COMPROMISE PRINCIPLES.

Mr. Chairman, why have we not regarded the teachings of history, the monitions of the fathers, the oft-recurring and bitter experience of the past? Why have we been content, at intervals of from seven to ten years, to find the mass of artisans and artificers of the country without employment, drawing from the savings bank their hoarded earnings, seeing the little homes, under the roofs of which they had hoped in ripe age to die, passing under the sheriff's hammer; and to see the forge, the furnace, the mill, and the workshop idle, and changing hands by forced sale oftentimes at less than a fourth, and sometimes at but a tithe of their original cost? Why have we been content to see the crop of the farmer rot in the field, while the laboring people of the cities were gnawed by hunger, and causing doubts of the stability of republican institutions by threatening, and in at least one instance absolutely perpetrating, bread riots? Why has our march of emigration been a march of desolation, and the son of him who emigrated to Ohio as the far West, finding his labor unrewarded by the famished land, been constrained to cry "Westward ho!" and go to contend with the trials and deprivations of frontier life, and found a new State still more remote from markets?

And why was it, sir, that when those who would overthrow our Government fired upon the flag, that, with our unequalled ingenuity, our sheep walks of limitless extent, our boundless water power, and our measureless stores of coal and iron, we were unable to provide adequate clothing and arms for the seventy-five thousand men summoned to our defense? There is but one answer to all these questions. We suffered all these ills because we had disregarded the laws I am endeavoring to illustrate and other fundamental truths in which, on every public occasion, we proclaim our belief; had endeavored to maintain in this free and busy age an anachronism, involving the denial of all rights, and the repression of the native ability of the laborers of one half of our country; and had endeavored to prove the solecism that slavery is an essential element of free institutions, and adds to the power of a country contending for supremacy with nations that are using every expedient to animate the industry, ingenuity, and enterprise of their people. By oppressing others we enfeebled and degraded ourselves. Slavery has its laws, and they are irreconcilable with those which quicken industry and develop material power. Time will not permit, nor is this the occasion for their discussion. It is enough for the present to say that they do not tolerate intelligent or required labor. They were understood and enforced by the slave-owning oligarchy, and were submitted to by the masses of the people, whose pride of race artfully fostered, deluded them into the belief that the inequalities of caste were consistent with the democracy of a professedly Christian republic. At last the delusion is dispelled, and with it go the cruel necessities by which those who, being freemen, were, under the compromises of the Constitution, enslaved by the inherent laws of slavery; and our country having corrected the solecism and banished the anachronism, may now enter upon a career of competition with the most advanced nations of the world. The vast and varied attractions the United States present to the hopeful, the enterprising, the ingenious and the skilled workmen of the world, are the means by which we may enfeeble all rival Powers, while building up our own, and augmenting the prosperity of our rapidly-increasing people. Slavery being dead, let us entomb with it its twin barbarism, British free trade. Henceforth our legislation may well be directed to advancing the greatest good not only of the greatest number, but the unquestioned good of all; and in this it will stand in strange contrast with its purposes and policy in the past. To show how wide that contrast will be, let me turn again to King Cotton. On page 96 of this royal volume I find it written:

"At the date of the passage of the Nebraska bill, the multiplication of provisions by their more extended cultivation, was the only measure left that could produce a reduction of prices and meet the wants of the planters. The Canadian reciprocity treaty, since secured, will bring the products of the British North American colonies, free of duty, into competition with those of the United States when prices with us rule high."

This was not written by an English hand.

Our forges, furnaces, and factories were unprofitable capital. Coal, ore, and limestone lay undisturbed in the places of their original deposit, and mechanics of skill and energy went begging for employment. Yet an American writer rejoiced that the means had been secured by which the farmers of the country could be made to suffer with the afflicted multitude. With that want of patriotism which has long characterized the leaders of the Democratic party, he exulted over the subjection of the agricultural interests of his country to those of British North America by that misnamed reciprocity treaty with Canada which southern influence had forced upon us, and lauded it as the sure means by which the farmer should be driven to a still greater distance from all other markets than that afforded by the few hundred thousand men who regarded no interests but their own, and believed that these could only be protected by procuring still cheaper food for their millions of slaves.

But listen to him again. On page 123 I find the following:

"From what has been said, the dullest intellect cannot fail now to perceive the rationale of the Kansas-Nebraska movement. The political influence which these Territories will give to the South will be of the first importance to perfect its arrangement for future slavery extension, whether by division of the larger States and Territories now secured to the institution, its extension into territory hitherto considered free, or the acquisition of new territory to be devoted to the system, so as to preserve the balance of power in Congress. When this is done, Kansas and Nebraska, like Kentucky and Missouri, will be of little consequence to slaveholders compared with the cheap and constant supply of provisions they can yield. Nothing, therefore, will so exactly coincide with southern interests as a rapid emigration of freemen into these new Territories. White free labor, doubly productive over slave labor in grain-growing, must be multiplied within their limits, that the cost of provisions may be reduced, and the extension of slavery and the growth of cotton suffer no interruption. The present efforts to plant them with slavery are indispensable to produce sufficient excitement to fill them speedily with a free population; and if this whole movement has been a southern scheme to cheapen provisions and increase the ratio of the production of sugar and cotton, as it most unquestionably will do, it surpasses the statesmanlike strategy which forced the people into an acquiescence in the annexation of Texas. And should the anti-slavery voters succeed in gaining the political ascendancy in these Territories, and bring them as free States triumphantly into the Union, what can they do but turn in as all the rest of the western States have done, and help to feed slaves, or those who manufacture or sell the products of the labor of slaves?"

These paragraphs show that the slaveholders achieved what an examination of the topography of the country might have led them to regard as a last grand triumph. Their system held undisputed sway; and let me ask whether, had they been content to live under the Government that existed, it could have prospered long? Two interests alone were to be pursued: the growing of grain in the North and West, and the growing of cotton, sugar, rice, tobacco, and hemp in the South. In the light of the extracts, showing the rapid exhaustion of our soil by the exportation of its products, which I presented in the earlier part of my remarks, and of the experience of every farmer and planter, will it be asserted that this system of culture could long have continued? Science could have calculated the years of its possible duration with almost perfect accuracy. When, under such a system, could the earth have rest for recuperation? And whence could come the stimulants to restore its wasted energies? The system omitted these essential conditions of prosperity, and thereby provided for its own decline. The scheme was an impracticable one, which though it might have served as a temporary expedient, could not endure, for it was in conflict with the laws of Providence.

It may be that an indistinct perception of this drove the oligarchy to the madness of war; for all now admit that there was not, in the election of Mr. Lincoln, or the purposes of the Republican party, anything to justify their attempt to destroy the Union by war. But, be this as it may, the war did but hasten, by a few years, the inevitable termination of their persistent folly and crime. The commercial crisis of 1860, following so closely upon that of 1857, and repeating, as both did so minutely, in all their details, the disastrous and wide-spread incidents of 1837 and 1840, would in themselves have constrained the people to demand such legislation as would promote and secure a diversification of our industries, the development of our resources, and the laying of foundations for a widely-extended commerce. The American people had become too numerous, too enlightened, too energetic, and had endured too many of these commercial crises to have been willing longer to submit their fortunes and destinies to the control of the few arrogant theorists, whose views were so narrow and whose fancied interests were so diametrically opposed to those of all the rest of their countrymen.

THEN AND NOW.

Sir, let us contemplate for a moment our condition when the champions of slavery and free trade fired on the flag of the country. April, 1861, found us unable to clothe our soldiers or furnish them with implements and munitions of war. When the President called for seventy-five thousand troops, and that number of the flower of our countrymen promptly responded, they were clad, not in our blue alone, but in gray, the chosen color of our enemy, in black, in red, or any other color, because we had not the proper material with which to clothe them. We had not the quality of iron from which to fashion a gun barrel, nor could we make it. We had not blankets to shield our men from rain or frost, in camp or bivouac; and as the people regarded the base character of the articles with which our Army was provided, many of which had been made from American rags in the shoddy towns of Yorkshire, they raised a universal cry of "fraud" against both public officers and contractors. Our mills, forges, furnaces, and factories stood still. The frugal laborer was living upon the earnings of past years. Commerce, having dwindled from the expiration of the protective tariff of 1842, had ceased to animate our ports. The crops of the West stood ungathered in the fields, and the bankruptcy of 1857, from which we had not yet recovered, had returned to sweep away the few who had withstood the surge.

But the case is altered now. Necessity has compelled us to do what reason and experience long ago suggested. The fact that we determined to pay in gold the interest on our bonds and to obtain the required bullion by collecting the duties on imports in coin, has done much to animate and diversify our industry. This fact and the general results of the war—for the duties we lay on raw materials and our internal taxes more than counterbalance the protection afforded to many branches of industry by our tariff laws—have enabled us to recover from our prostration and started us in a career of prosperity and progress; and if wisdom guide our legislation, the waste lands of which I have read will soon be reinvigorated; the ancient village will be absorbed in the expanding city; new towns will mark the plain and river bank; and where the mean white and the negro have loitered listlessly through the months, diversified and well-paid industry, quickening their energies and expanding their desires, will employ all their hours, and enable each to carve his way as an American citizen should do in a career that will afford him pleasure or profit. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] may desire to recall the idleness and misery of 1860, but I cannot believe that he is justified in intimating that President Johnson sympathizes with him in this respect.

VIRGINIA.

General Frank P. Blair, jr., intent upon neutralizing any service he may have rendered the country during the war, having gathered about him the representative men of the eighty thousand disfranchised traitors of Missouri with whom he now affiliates, recently charged, as does the gentleman from Indiana, that the Republican party of the country is under the control of men whose object is to aggrandize New England, and by a protective tariff tax the agricultural interests of the country for the benefit of a few wealthy manufacturers, and that the resistance offered to the admission of representatives of the conquered but unregenerated people of the South in Congress is the result of this purpose. How false this is he well knows; for every member of the family in the councils of which he bears so distinguished a part, and which always speaks as a unit, may be shown, by their published utterances, to understand that protection to American industry is essential to the prosperity of the agricultural interests of the country. Adequate protection to American industry, its defense against the assaults of the accumulated capital, machinery, cheap labor, and skill of foreign countries, is of less importance to the middle and New England States than to any other portion of the country. The wasted South most needs it; and next to the South the Northwest, rich in all the elements of manufacturing greatness, and poor only from her want of local markets, which the diversification of her industry and development of her multifarious resources would create.

Sir, Virginia is not a New England State; nor do her people delight in being called Yankees, though they will hereafter be as proud as we are of our national cognomen. But no portion of our country, unless it be General Blair's own Missouri, with her boundless stores of varied mineral wealth, would be so blessed by setting all its poor at work upon the growth of its own lands as Virginia. A discriminating writer, who in August last traversed a large portion of the gold region of the State, in company with three eminent mineralogists, in the course of an article in the December number of Harper's Magazine, says:

"To give any adequate description of the mineral wealth which Virginia contains, would be not only to minutely describe every rod of her entire length, embracing hundreds of miles, but to enumerate almost every mineral of value hitherto known among mankind. It is not in gold alone that she abounds—but, scattered in profusion over almost her entire surface, are to be found iron, copper, silver, tin, tellurium, lead, platinum, cinnabar, plumbago, manganese, asbestos, kaolin, slate clay, coal, roofing slate of the greatest durability, marbles of the rarest beauty, soap stone, sulphur, hone-stone equal to the best Turkey, gypsum, lime, copperas, blue stone, grind stone, cobalt, emery, and a variety of other materials that we have hitherto been compelled to import or to do without. Indeed, it may be said, without exaggeration, that in the single State of Virginia, in the most singular juxtaposition of what might be considered geologically incongruous materials, is to be found an almost exhaustless fund of God-given treasures, more than enough to pay off our whole national debt, and only awaiting the magic touch of capital and enterprise to drag them to light for the benefit of man."

Of what avail have these boundless deposits of multiform riches been to the people of Virginia, and what have the Democratic party, slavery, and British free trade done for their most fortunately situated and devoted adherents? The aristocracy of Virginia have withheld from the laborer his hire, and the native fertility of their land has wasted away. They have traded in human muscles as a source of power, and laboring men have shunned their inviting climate; and their water power, exceeding in one year the muscular power all the slaves found in the United States at the taking of the last census, could put forth in a lifetime, has flowed idly to the sea, often through forests so wide that it could "hear no sound save its own dashing." And the State, from having at the close of the last century been the first in point of population and political power, fell, in sixty years, as is shown by the census of 1860, to be the fifth in population, and to rank the equal of free young Indiana in the fifth class in political power.

The laws of Providence are inflexible and it could not be otherwise. Despising labor, the Heaven-appointed condition on which alone man shall eat bread, she tended year by year toward poverty and want, and though she raised millions of laboring people of every shade of human complexion, the sweat of their brows enriched not her fields but those of other States. Like Germany before the establishment of the Zoll-Verein, and Ireland since the Union, she raised little else than laboring people for exportation. If he that fails to provide for his family be worse than an infidel, what shall be said of the Government that drives the heirs to so goodly a heritage as the lands of Virginia forth to dwell among strangers in want and ignorance.

The Republicans of New England and the middle States would make all her people comfortable, happy, and intelligent, in the homes of their fathers. We of Pennsylvania will welcome them to generous rivalry in every branch of industry to which we have devoted ourselves. In this age of iron, fire is force, and Virginia is underlaid by the purest fuel. If she wishes to leave her rich gold and silver mines in all their wealth to posterity, let her rival us in contributing to the needed supply of iron and steel for the exhausted South. Her kaolin is equal to any in England, and why will she not lessen our dependence on that country by building up an American Staffordshire, and embodying in porcelain the conceptions of American art? And as the product of the quarries of New Jersey and northeastern Pennsylvania have driven British roofing and school slates from our northern market, why will not she send hers to every market in the South? The country would be none the less powerful or respectable if every child in that section, however black, were expert in the use of the slate and pencil, or if their now squalid homes were embellished, as are those of many of the working people of the North, by ornate brackets, bracket shelves, mantles, pier slabs, and table, bureau, and washstand tops of whatever body but the connoisseur and expert mistakes for porcelain, mosaic, or Spanish, Egyptian, red and green Pyrenean, verd-antique, Siennese, porphyry, brocatel, or other marbles, but which are produced at little cost from the slate of Lehigh county.

PENNSYLVANIA CHALLENGES GENEROUS COMPETITION.

Is it said, sir, that Pennsylvania seeks to obtain a monopoly of the American iron market? Why, then, does she ask you to so legislate that capital shall find its advantage, and the laborer become rich, in working the unmeasured iron and coal-beds of her near neighbors, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee? England can no longer supply herself with charcoal pig iron. She has not the fuel. Her forests have yielded to the demand for pasturage and sheep walks. She is in this respect dependent on foreign countries, and buys such pig metal as raw material where she can get it best and cheapest, from Sweden, Norway, Russia, or Nova Scotia, all of which are in the same isothermal zone in which are found, underlying forests which yield an average of fifty cords per acre, the inexhaustible beds of better than Swedish ore of the Marquette region of Michigan and Wisconsin. And, gentlemen of the Northwest, I ask you whether patriotic Pennsylvania manifests a disposition to tax you for her advantage when she challenges your competition, and implores you to help her to outdo England without fighting, and enrich yourselves by setting unemployed laborers at work with the growth of your own lands. The Bessemer or pneumatic converter is coming largely into use, and the exigencies of the war and the incidental protection it has given our industry have created manufactories of American steel; and in each of these facts you have a guarantee of steady increase in the demand for your unrivaled product, and of the profits of the railroad companies, which will carry away your commodities and return with people to build the cities your expanding iron and steel works must create. A few figures will verify these assertions. Dr. Robert H. Lamborn, than whom there is no more careful statistician, tells us that—

"By comparing the production of this region with that of other iron districts, it will be found that it produced in 1864 more pig metal than Connecticut or Massachusetts in the same year, and sixty per cent. more than New York in 1850. Reckoning ore and metal together, the mines of Marquette threw into consumption in 1864 one hundred and fifty-four thousand nine hundred and five tons of metal, or three fifths as much as the total pig-iron production of the United States, according to the census returns of 1850, and one eighth of all the pig iron produced by the United States in 1864."

In view of these gratifying facts, can it be possible that the people of the Northwest are anxious for an early renewal of the "tripartite alliance formed by the western farmer, the southern planter, and the English manufacturer," so exultantly referred to in "Cotton is King," by which the furnaces producing all this metal shall be closed, and their proprietors and the laborers they employ reduced to bankruptcy, as those of Ohio and Pennsylvania have so often been by British free trade?

If, gentlemen of Missouri, Pennsylvania is seeking a monopoly, why do her people labor to persuade you to produce at the base of Iron mountain and Pilot Knob the utilities to the creation of which they devote their capital and industry? No, our efforts are not selfish. We wish to raise the prostrate South and give her an onward and upward career, and to secure to the American laborer wages so liberal that the report thereof shall invite to our shores the skilled and enterprising workmen of every craft and country. By employing all our people with the growth of our own lands we can create an urgent demand for labor, and thereby solve the most difficult problem before the country; for when labor is in quick demand its value will be regarded and the rights of the laborer protected.

By no other means can the exhausted South be restored or the work of her recuperation be commenced. Who will emigrate to the recently insurgent States? Vast and varied and peculiar as are their natural resources, will capital, proverbially timid as it is, fly to a region characterized by turbulence and lawlessness, or enterprise to a land in which labor is regarded as the disgraceful office of a subject race, and where legislation is employed to repress the intellect and suppress the aspirations of the laboring people for a higher and better life? Sir, there is not a northern State that does not outbid them for emigrants and offer superior inducements to the capitalist and those that are infinitely more attractive to him who has but his labor and that of his family to sell. Pennsylvania needs a million laborers. She can feed and clothe and house them all should they come to her in the current year. We want them to gather and refine petroleum, to construct and manage railroads, to conduct our internal carrying trade, to build factories, forges, furnaces, founderies, and the towns they will beget; to quarry slate, zinc, coal, iron, marble, and the thousand other elements of wealth condensed within the limits of our State. Inert, as these natural elements of wealth are, they are of no available value; but the quickening touch of labor will transmute them all to gold, and energy and enterprise and capital, in the hands of men whose earlier years were passed in manual labor, are holding out to industry the richest bribes to induce it to come and help pay our national debt and increase our country's power by enriching themselves and us. But, sir, we offer higher inducements than wages in dollars and cents. Our equal laws, recognizing that the children of a State are its jewels, put a school-house near every laboring man's dwelling, and as a reward for his industry, and to increase the power of the State, secure to each child coming into it the keys of all knowledge in the mastery of the English language, the art of writing, and at least the elementary rules of arithmetic. And in the neighborhood of every hamlet the church spire points the way from earth to heaven. Before the altar employer and workman meet as equals, and in the same class in the Sunday-school their children learn practical lessons of Christian equality.

A SUGGESTION AND EXAMPLE TO THE SOUTH.

These are conditions that the South cannot yet offer to the emigrant from our fields or those of Europe. If she would prosper she must Americanize her system of life, abandon her contempt for labor, and her habits of violence and disregard of law. She must learn to respect man as man, and stimulate his exertions by quickening his intellect, expanding and chastening his desires, and insuring him a just reward for whatever he shall put forth in the way of industry or ingenuity or enterprise. She can only create the elements of her new and great future by developing the resources now at her command, the chief of which she will find to be her apt and docile laboring people. Her present purpose seems to be not to do this, but to enter on a new career of oppression. Her dream is still of dominion over large plantations and imbruted laborers. Let her abandon the problem, "How can I make my laborers work?" and occupy herself upon the gentler one, "How can I induce these people by whom I am surrounded to enrich themselves and me?" and she will begin to learn how rich and powerful she is. When she shall have accomplished thus much, when her laborers are freely paid and her common schools offer shelter and culture to the laborer's child, she may successfully appeal to those who can elsewhere find wages, security, and equal chances in life to come and cast their lot with her. She should hasten the coming of that day. In common with us, she is burdened by the debt of $3,000,000,000 in which she has involved us. Let her remember that she, too, has coal, iron, lead, copper, zinc, silver and gold, cinnabar, tellurium, and all the elements of manufacturing and commercial power which characterize so abundantly every section of our country; that she has broad land which will not be fully worked when every man and woman within its limits may say with truth, "I am indeed an American citizen, and have, by my well-requited voluntary labor, earned the bread my dear family has this day eaten." And she will find that she has added vastly to her wealth when the field hand shall have been transformed into a skilled workman; when he who, under the lash, has lazily hoed cotton or corn, under the stimulus of liberal wages, converts ore and coal into rails, cannon, or anchors, or into any of the thousand minor fabrics from the fish-hook and the sail or packing needle to the heavy and complicated lock advertised in the catalogue of one concern, that of Russell & Erwin, of New Britain, in Connecticut—a State producing so little iron as to be scarcely remembered when enumerating the iron-producing Commonwealths of the country. This concern, I am informed, sold but $30,000 worth of goods in the first year of their operations, and $3,000,000 worth during the last year. Meanwhile it has concentrated in the village enlivened by its works a thriving and highly-educated population, and has converted unskilled laborers into mechanics and accomplished mechanicians, though their hands were no nimbler or their minds more comprehensive or versatile than those of the laborers to be found in the devastated South, whose extermination or expatriation seems to be within the purview of those who assert their right to control the policy of that section.

It is not for the rich, the comparatively few who have accumulated capital, that we demand protection. We ask it in the name of the millions who live by toil, whose dependence is on their skill and ability to labor, and whose labor creates the wealth of the country. To what fearful competition they are subjected when by withholding protection we leave them undefended against the assaults of British capital, is aptly set forth by Daniel J. Morrell, Esq., in his admirable letter to the secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association. He says:

"That portion of the price of a ton of imported iron which stands for the wages of labor, represents coarse food, mean raiment, and worse lodging, political nullity, enforced ignorance, servitude in a single occupation, with a prospect of eventual relief from the parish."

"That portion of the price of a ton of American iron which stands for the wages of labor, represents fresh and wholesome food, good raiment, the homestead, unlimited freedom of movement and change of occupation, intelligent support of all the machinery of municipal, State, and national Government, with a prospect of comfortable old age, at last dividing its substance with blessings among prosperous children."

"Thus it is easy to see why imported iron may be cheap and American iron dear; for the latter, in addition to its other burdens, pays an extraordinary tax to freedom and enlightenment, which are assuredly deserving of protection."

Mr. Morrell evidently does not agree with the magnates of the South in their opinion that the way to make a State great and powerful is to oppress and degrade its working people.

WE CAN PAY OUR DEBTS "WITHOUT MONEYS."

I have never been able to believe that a national debt is a national blessing. I have seen how good might be interwoven with or educed from evil, or how a great evil might, under certain conditions, be turned to good account; but beyond this, I have never been able to regard debt, individual or national, as a blessing. It may be that, as in the inscrutable providence of God it required nearly five years of war to extirpate the national crime of slavery, and anguish and grief found their way to nearly every hearth-side in the country before we could recognize the manhood of the race we had so long oppressed, it was also necessary that we should be involved in a debt of unparalleled magnitude that we might be compelled to avail ourselves of the wealth that lies so freely around us, and by opening markets for well-rewarded industry, make our land, what in theory it has ever been, the refuge of the oppressed of all climes. England, if supreme selfishness be consistent with sagacity, has been eminently sagacious in preventing us from becoming a manufacturing people; for with our enterprise, our ingenuity, our freer institutions, the extent of our country, the cheapness of our land, the diversity of our resources, the grandeur of our seas, lakes, and rivers, we should long ago have been able to offer her best workmen such inducements as would have brought them by millions to help bear our burdens and fight our battles. We can thus raise the standard of British and continental wages and protect American workmen against ill-paid competition. This we must do if we mean to maintain the national honor. The fields now under culture, the houses now existing, the mines now being worked, the men we now employ, cannot pay our debt. To meet its annual interest by taxing our present population and developed resources would be to continue an ever-enduring burden.

The principal of the debt must be paid; but as it was contracted for posterity its extinguishment should not impoverish those who sustained the burdens of the war. I am not anxious to reduce the total of our debt, and would, in this respect, follow the example of England, and as its amount has been fixed would not for the present trouble myself about its aggregate except to prevent its increase. My anxiety is that the taxes it involves shall be as little oppressive as possible, and be so adjusted that, while defending our industry against foreign assault, they may add nothing to the cost of those necessities of life which we cannot produce, and for which we must therefore look to other lands. The raw materials entering into our manufactures, which we are yet unable to produce but on which we unwisely impose duties, I would put into the free list with tea, coffee and other such purely foreign essentials of life, and would impose duties on commodities that compete with American productions, so as to protect every feeble or infant branch of industry and quicken those that are robust. I would thus cheapen the elements of life and enable those whose capital is embarked in any branch of production to offer such wages to the skilled workmen of all lands as would steadily and rapidly increase our numbers, and, as is always the case in the neighborhood of growing cities or towns of considerable extent, increase the return for farm labor; this policy would open new mines and quarries, build new furnaces, forges, and factories, and rapidly increase the taxable property and taxable inhabitants of the country. Would the South accept this theory and enter heartily upon its execution, she would pay more than now seems her share of the debt and feel herself blessed in the ability to do it. Her climate is more genial than ours; her soil may be restored to its original fertility; her rivers are broad, and her harbors good; and above all, hers is the monopoly of the fields for rice, sugar, and cotton. Let us pursue for twenty years the sound national policy of protection, and we will double our population and more than quadruple our capital and reduce our indebtedness per capita and per acre to little more than a nominal sum. Thus each man can "without moneys" pay the bulk of his portion of the debt by blessing others with the ability to bear an honorable burden.

How protection, by animating, diversifying, and rewarding industry, will pay our debt is well shown by the experience of the last five years. And though we do not owe that experience to sagacious legislation, but, as I have said, to the incidents of the war, it should guide our future steps. The disparity between gold and paper has added to the duties imposed on foreign products, and enabled our manufacturers to enter upon a career of prosperity such as they have never enjoyed, save for a brief period, under the tariffs of 1824 and 1828, and again for four years under that of 1842, a prosperity in which the farmers are sharing abundantly, as is shown by the fact that they are now out of debt, though most of their farms were mortgaged five years ago. When the war began we could not, as I have said, make the iron for a gun-barrel; we can now export better gun-barrels than we can import. We then made no steel, and had to rely on foreign countries for material for steel cannon and those steel-pointed shot by which only we can pierce the five-and-a-half-inch iron-clads with which we must contend in future warfare. Many of our regiments that came first to the capital came in rags, though every garment on their backs was new, and many of them of freshly imported cloth. But, sir, no army in the world was ever so substantially clothed and armed as was that which for two days passed in review before the President of the United States and the Lieutenant General after having conquered the rebellion, and which, when disbanded, was clad in the product of American spindles and looms, and armed with weapons of American materials and construction.

It is said that ten years ago "a piece of Lake Superior iron ore was a curiosity to most of our practical metallurgists." In 1855 the first ore was shipped from Marquette county. How rapid the enlargement of the trade has been is shown by the following statement:

In 1855 there were exported.....	1,445 tons.
1857.....	26,184 "
1858.....	31,135 "
1859.....	65,679 "
1860.....	116,948 "
1861.....	45,430 "
1862.....	115,720 "
1864.....	255,123 "

The production of charcoal pig iron in that region, we are told by Dr. Lamborn, commenced at the Pioneer works near the Jackson mine in 1858. Those works were the pioneers of a great army, and already the Collinsville, the Forrestville, the Morgan, and the Greenwood furnaces are in profitable operation. The production of charcoal iron in that county has been as follows:

In 1858 there were exported.....	1,627 tons.
1860.....	5,680 "
1861.....	7,970 "
1862.....	8,590 "
1863.....	8,908 "
1864.....	13,832 "

And though we produced no steel in 1860, a table constructed from information furnished by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the year ending June 30, 1864, shows that the Government had in that year derived $391,141 39 of internal revenue from the steel made and manufactured in the United States during that year.

Time will not permit me to indicate the many new branches of industry which have sprung up, or the vast extension and improvement of those which, under our old free-trade system, had found an insecure footing and were enduring a sickly existence. I may, however, venture on a few remarks upon this head. California is not a New England or an eastern State; she has perhaps been less affected by the war than any other State, unless it be Oregon; and I find that, though she raised in 1859 but 2,378,000 pounds of wool, she raised in 1863 7,600,000, and in 1864, 8,000,000 pounds. She is, we are assured by her papers, realizing the advantage of bringing the producer and consumer together; and though during the last year she shipped to New York some 7,500,000 pounds of wool, she is showing that her people understand the importance of saving the double transportation they would otherwise pay on those of their own products they might consume—that for carrying the raw material to the factory, and that for bringing the fabrics back again. I find in one of her papers the following statement:

"CALIFORNIA WOOLEN MILLS.—The Pioneer Mill, at Black Point, California, has thirty-one looms at work now, consumes annually 1,200,000 pounds of wool, employs 220 laborers, pays out $100,000 yearly in wages, uses a capital of $500,000, and runs fifty-two sewing machines. About one fourth of the wool purchased is used in making blankets, the importation of which has now entirely ceased, the home production having taken entire possession of the market. Nearly half the production is flannel, which is gradually crowding the imported article out of the market. About one third of the wool consumed at this mill is made into tweeds and cassimeres, which is mostly made up into clothing in San Francisco. Broadcloth is not made there in quantity, because of the scarcity of pure merino wool. The Pioneer and Mission Mills together consume about 2,400,000 pounds of wool, employ about 450 laborers and $1,000,000 of capital, and pay out $200,000 in wages annually."

Well done, California. Your tweeds and cassimeres and blankets will crowd foreign articles not out of your own State alone, but out of the markets of the States of the Pacific slope. You will soon need machinists to construct your sewing-machines and make the tools for those who do such work. Land around your cities will grow in value; and those who own it need not compete with farmers so distant from market as to limit them to the production of grain alone. Hay, potatoes, turnips, and all other roots for the sustenance of man and beast and fruits for the table, may engage their attention and give them ample reward for their labor.

Oregon has also felt the quickening influence of the times. She paid to the internal revenue department, during 1864, taxes on the manufacture of $128,620 67 of woollen cloth.

THE PEOPLE OF THE PRAIRIES NEED A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

The people of the prairies, next to those of the desolated South, are interested in the creation and maintenance of diversified industry. While they depend on grain-growing, and that commerce which English free trade permits the producers of raw materials to enjoy, cities will be founded and grow at points on the lakes and rivers; but none of these even can be great cities without manufactures. Here and there a concentration of railroads may also create a first-class town or an inferior city; but the rest of their wide country will be but sparsely populated by an agricultural community, and dotted at wide distances apart by beautiful villages such as now gratify the eye of the traveler through the West.

The prairie States have within them the elements of innumerable profitable industries. The western farmer clears his new land by girdling and burning the primitive forests. The wood is not without value, and condensed as it might be, it would bear transportation to a market. Constituents of mine have been for two years engaged in erecting works which cover over fifteen acres of land for the production of paper pulp from wood. There now lie around their vast buildings thirty-five thousand cords of wood; and in a few days they hope to put their works in operation. For awhile they ran part of their machinery and produced to their entire satisfaction and that of the trade pulp which, intermingled with five per cent. or less of that produced from cotton rags, furnished admirable printing paper.

Now, the corn husks—ay, and the corn with the husks—of the farmers of the West, go to waste, or find no better use than supplying them with fuel during the winter. The following article, clipped from the New York Evening Post of November 25, invites them to experiment and learn whether they act more wisely in wasting this material than the southern planters, who feared the establishment of American manufactures, did in failing to utilize their cotton seed, which, if we may accept De Bow's authority, would have produced from $100,000,000 to $120,000,000 per annum if converted into oil and oil cake:

"At a recent meeting of the Institute of Technology in Boston, Mr. Bond made a statement of results recently attained in this country and in Europe in the manufacture of paper from corn husks. Experiments upon this material have been in progress in Bohemia since 1854, but have not reached a satisfactory result until within the last two or three years. In the successful processes lately adopted the husks were boiled in an alkaline mixture, after which there remained a quantity of fiber mixed with gluten. The gluten was extracted by pressure, forming a nutritious article like 'oil cake,' and then the fiber was subjected to other processes in which it produced the real paper 'stock' or 'pulp,' and left a fiber which has been made into strong and serviceable cloth. The husks yield forty per cent. of useful material; ten per cent. of fiber; eleven per cent. gluten, and nineteen per cent. of paper stock. This paperstock is equal to that made from the best linen rags. Allowing the profit of thirty-eight per cent. to the manufacturer, the different articles can be produced for six cents per pound for fiber, one and a half cent for gluten, and four cents for paper stock."

Were this branch of manufactures well established on the prairies, the press of the West would give up its denunciations of the paper makers of the country as conspirators, monopolists, and extortioners, and cease to publish such paragraphs as the following, clipped from a recent number of the Galena (Illinois) Gazette:

"We understand that many of the people of Warren and other towns in the east part of the county are using corn for fuel. We had a conversation with an intelligent gentleman who has been burning it, and who considers it much cheaper than wood. Ears of corn can be bought for ten cents per bushel by measure, and seventy bushels, worth seven dollars, will measure a cord."

Could the people of Illinois bring themselves to believe that they are capable of doing any other labor than raising raw material, they would bring into use cheaper fuel than corn or wood at seven dollars a cord. Their lands are underlaid by lead, zinc, copper, and iron; and would they determine to bring their metals into market as much manufactured as their skill and supply of labor will permit, they would, by creating a demand for fuel, compel the development of the magnificent deposits of bituminous coal through which the Illinois Central railroad runs. Let them be admonished before it is too late that the fertility of their soil, exuberant as it is, is not exhaustless.

But, inviting as is this branch of my subject, I must leave it with the remark that, ignorant as we are of the extent of our mineral deposits, we are more ignorant of the uses to which may be applied many elements of life with which within a limited range of purposes we are quite familiar; and that, varied and wide as are the expanding opportunities to achieve usefulness and wealth, he who embarks his capital or enterprise in such as will yield the most golden results will not be more benefited by the introduction of new branches of manufacture than the owners of land, who will find in the markets of the village and the refuse of the factory the means of following the methods of English husbandry, and succeeding the exhausting white crop by a green one, and giving to the soil each year more of the elements of fertility than the crop abstracts from it; and who, having a market at their doors, will save the transportation which now makes a yard of Manchester cloth worth many bushels of wheat in Kansas, and a bushel of Kansas wheat worth many yards of the same cloth in Manchester. Under free trade transporters, factors, and commission men have absorbed what would have been the joint profit of the American manufacturer and the grain-grower, had the producer and the consumer been side by side or in reasonable proximity to each other.

DOMESTIC COMMERCE IS MORE PROFITABLE THAN FOREIGN.

There is other commerce than that between foreign nations. France and England lie nearer to each other than New Jersey and Ohio, or than Indiana and Missouri. Commerce between New England and the Pacific slope takes place at the end of longer voyages than that between New and Old England. A quick market and active capital make prosperous commerce. Interest on borrowed capital is often a fatal parasite, and a nimble sixpence is always better than a sluggish shilling. Commerce is the traffic in or transfer of commodities. It should reward two capitals or industries—those of the producer of each commodity; and where trade is reciprocal, and really free, each man selling or buying because he wishes to do so, it does reward both. It is, therefore, apparent, that if we consume American fabrics, as well as home-grown food, these two profits, and a third, (two of which now accrue to foreigners, one absolutely and the other in great part,) would remain in the country. These are the profits on the production of raw material, on its manufacture, and on its too often double transportation. But trade between a country in which capital is abundant, and the machinery of which, having paid for itself in profits already realized, is cheap, as is the case in England, and a new, or in these respects poor, country, as is ours, is never reciprocal; for the party with capital and machinery fixes the terms on which it both buys and sells.

In addition to keeping both profits on our commerce at home and doing our own carrying, the diversification of our industry will insure markets for all our products, and render the destruction of any one of the leading interests of the country by a foreign commercial Power an impossibility. By securing the home market to our industry, and giving security to the investment of capital in furnaces, forges, mills, railroads, factories, foundries, and workshops, we can steadily enlarge the tide of immigration. Men will flow into all parts of our country—some to find remunerative employment at labor in which they are skilled; some, finding that land, mineral wealth, water-power, and commercial advantages are open to all in an eminent degree, will come in pursuit of enterprises of moment, and each new settlement, each new village or town, and each new branch of industry established, around which thousands of people may settle, will be a new market for the products of our skill and industry: so that we shall not only become independent of Great Britain in so far as not to depend on her for that which is essential to our comfort or welfare, but independent in having a population whose productions will be so diverse that though the seas that roll around us were, as Jefferson once wished them, "seas of fire," our commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural employments could go on undisturbed by what was happening in other lands. When we shall have attained this condition of affairs we will build ships and have foreign commerce, for we will have that to carry away which, being manufactured, will contain in packages of little bulk our raw material, food, mechanical skill, and the labors of our machinery, impelled by our coal; and in exchange we will get whatever of raw material we do not produce, and the ability to retain the basis of a sound currency which England and France, by the free trade they preach but do not practice, now draw from us and other countries in the position we so humbly occupy of producers of raw material, whose people lack the foresight or the ability to supply themselves with clothing and the means of elegant life.

WHAT CONGRESS SHOULD DO.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to propose any specific modifications of our tariff or internal revenue laws. They operate most unfortunately upon several leading interests of the country and eminently so on the producers of umbrellas, manilla cordage, and railroad iron. But I have confidence in the gentlemen composing the Committee of Ways and Means, and the suggestive report of the United States Revenue Commissioner is now before us. The responsibility will justly rest on Congress, if with such aids we fail to correct those incongruities in our laws which have prostrated several important branches of manufactures to the injury of the laboring people of the country.

I may, however, remark that I am opposed to prohibitions or prohibitory duties, but will gladly unite in imposing on foreign manufactured commodities such discriminating duties as will defend our industries from overwhelming assaults at the hands of the selfish capitalists who see that Britain's power depends on Britain's manufacturing supremacy, and are ever ready to expend a portion of their surplus capital in the overthrow of the rising industries of other nations. Judicious legislation on this subject will, by inviting hither her skilled workmen and sturdy yeomen, so strengthen us and enfeeble England that she will not make railways and other improvements for military purposes in Canada, for she will see that, when Canada shall be made the base of military operations against the United States, her American dominions will pass promptly into our possession.

WE ARE STILL IN COLONIAL BONDAGE TO ENGLAND.

I find, sir, in a journal upon which I am in the habit of relying, in an article on the British exports of iron and steel, the statement that during the seven months terminating July 31, 1865, the United States purchased more than one third of the railroad and bar iron exported by England. While we were thus adding to the wealth and power of England, by purchasing one third of her entire export of railroad and bar iron, one of her "men-of-war," commanded by an American traitor, was destroying our unarmed whalers engaged in the peaceful pursuits of their dangerous trade, and our furnaces, forges, and rolling-mills were idle, or but partially employed. The internal taxes levied directly and indirectly on a ton of American railroad iron are heavier than the duty imposed on a ton of foreign rails by our tariff, and at this time most of the furnaces and rolling-mills of our country are suspended. The Pennsylvania iron works at Danville, in that State, make both pig and railroad iron. The invested capital of the company is $1,500,000. When in full operation it employs twelve hundred men, upon whom not less than five thousand women and children depend. The works are adapted to the production of both pig iron and rails. They cannot, however, produce an adequate supply of iron for the rolling-mills, and the company are annual purchasers of pig iron. Their capacity is twenty-seven thousand tons pig iron and thirty-three thousand tons of rails. Their actual production in the two last years was but as follows:

In 1864, Pig iron.....	17,151 tons.
Rails.....	22,512 "
In 1865, Pig iron.....	14,758 "
Rails.....	15,956 "

The Rough and Ready rolling-mill, in the same town, is capable of producing about twelve thousand tons of rails per annum. Its proprietors purchase their pig iron. Its production during the two last years has been in the exact proportion to its capacity as that of the Pennsylvania works. The difficulty with both is that our internal taxes so far more than counter-balance the protection afforded by our tariff that when gold ranges at less than forty British iron masters can undersell either in our own markets. Our laws instead of protecting American labor discriminate against it and in favor of that of England. The duties and internal taxes on iron evidently need revising. The interest is depressed, not only in Pennsylvania, but in every part of the country. During the latter part of the seven months referred to four rolling-mills in southeastern Ohio, with a capacity of sixteen thousand tons of rails per annum, were idle, and the blast furnaces in the region which can produce one hundred and thirty-five thousand tons of charcoal pig metal, produced in 1865 but forty-five thousand.

Of the twenty furnaces on and near the Allegheny river, in Pennsylvania, only eight were in blast at the close of the year. I am told there are nine blast furnaces in Missouri capable of producing about forty-five thousand tons, and that but three are now in operation. But one of the four blast furnaces near Detroit was in operation in December. The twenty-five rolling-mills of Pittsburgh were, I am informed, then running but quarter-time, and the production of bloom iron in the counties of New York bordering on Lake Champlain was in 1865 but about one third of that of 1864. Let me ask, sir, whether Congress is faithful to the laboring men of the country when it deprives them of the opportunity to enrich themselves and the country by expending their labor on the growth of our own lands.

From the same journal I also learn that, during the same seven months, the United States imported more than one half of the unwrought steel exported from Great Britain, while a very carefully prepared list of the steel-works of the country, showing the kinds of steel made, the product for the last year, and the capacity of each, shows that the product during the last year was but eighteen thousand four hundred and fifteen tons, though the capacity of the works is forty-two thousand one hundred tons. It thus appears that we could have made of the growth of our own lands, and by the employment of our own people, every ton of rails, bar iron, and unwrought steel we imported during that period. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] say that it would not have been wise to withhold this patronage from our treacherous rival and bestow it upon our toiling countrymen?

The western farmer and railroad man say "Let me buy iron and steel cheap; it is my right to buy where I can buy for least money;" and their Representative, complying with their wishes, refuses to put an adequate duty upon iron and steel. May it not be pertinent to remind these gentlemen that the manufacturers of the iron and steel they import live in houses built of British timber and British stone, and furnished with British furniture; that they are taught, so far as they are educated, by English teachers; attended in sickness by English doctors; clothed and shod by English artisans; and that their wages are expended in confirming British supremacy by augmenting British industry and British commerce; that they are fed with wheat gathered on the banks of the Nile and the Baltic, or wherever England can buy it cheapest; and that General Jackson's assertion, that to transfer six hundred thousand men from agricultural to manufacturing employments would give us a greater market for our agricultural products than all Europe now supplies, is as true now as it was when first uttered. But that, if we import the men to make the iron and steel we will need for 1866, 1867, and 1868, the implements with which they will dig the limestone ore, and mine the coal, will be of American production; the food they will eat will be grown on American soil; the timber of the houses they will occupy will be cut from American forests; the stones with which it will mingle will be quarried from American quarries; and the tailor, shoemaker, and hatter, the teacher, preacher, and doctor, and all others whose services they will require, and whose presence will augment the population of the village, the town, or the city will be Americans, and depend for their supplies on American labor. And may I not ask whether the farmers of the country, in being relieved from colonial dependence and having a steady market thus brought to their door—a market in which wheat from the banks of the Nile and the shores of the Baltic will never compete with and cheapen theirs—would not, though they paid more dollars per ton, find that they were buying their iron and steel cheaper if they gave fewer bushels of wheat for it, and less frequently consumed their surplus crops as fuel or permitted them to rot in the field? He does not buy most cheaply who pays least money for the articles he gets, but he who gives the least percentage of his day's, month's or year's labor in exchange for a given commodity; and tested by this standard, the cheapest market in which iron and steel can be bought for American purposes will be found in the protected market of America.

PROTECTION CHEAPENS GOODS.

But protection begets competition and invariably cheapens the money value of commodities. This is not mere theory; it is fact established by the experience of all nations that have protected their industry. Washington's Secretary of the Treasury understood this as perfectly as the adept in social science understands it today. Every nation that ever protected its industry improved the quality and lessened the price of its productions; and no people, while not protecting their manufactures, have ever been able to hold a fair position among the commercial nations of the world, because they could not compete in cheapness with protected industries. While Holland protected her industry more adequately than England, she sold her cheap goods in that country and maintained her supremacy on the seas. It was thence that the Dutch raised the ire of Andrew Yarrinton by taunting Englishmen with their want of skill, and England with her want of civilization, in selling her raw products at the price others would give, and buying back part of them when manufactured at the price at which others would sell. But when England perfected her protective system, her superior advantages in coal and iron gave her commercial supremacy, by enabling her to cheapen articles she had believed herself unable to produce, and to employ British ships in carrying English fabrics to mere growers of raw material in every part of the world.

France, as I have shown, protects her industry, and her silks, laces, cloths, cassimeres, and products of iron and steel hold their place in the markets of the world in spite of England's larger commercial marine and more abundant supply of coal and iron. Has protection increased the price of anything but labor in Germany? Before the establishment of the Zoll-Verein or Customs-Union she exported nothing but raw materials, and was only too happy, as I have shown, to send with these her peasantry either for war or civic purposes; but under the influence of protection the value of man has risen in Germany, and that of German products fallen in the markets of the world, till her cloths and the multifarious products of her diversified industry compete with those of England and France in the markets of the United States and other nations whose people devote themselves exclusively to the production of raw materials. Even Russia, with her thirty millions of recently freed serfs, who enter upon the duties of freemen without disturbance, because the wise emperor who enfranchised them had secured employment and wages for each by protecting the industry of all, is now entering into the general markets of the world in competition with France, Germany, Belgium, and England. But we enter no foreign market with productions which attest our wealth, skill, genius, or enterprise; and the prices of what we do export—grain, coarse provisions, and whisky—depend on such contingencies as drought, excessive rain, the potato rot, or other widespread calamity for a transatlantic market. When good crops prevail in Europe there is no market there for us. Consistent with the experience of other nations has been our own. Under the tariffs of 1824 and 1828 the prices of all those commodities in the production of which our people engaged to any extent fell rapidly. When the tariff of 1842 went into effect our country was flooded with British hardware of every variety, from a tenpenny nail to a circular saw, and from table cutlery to butt hinges, thumb latches, &c. But when 1847 came round, four years of adequate protection had so stimulated the skill and ingenuity of Americans, and had brought from Great Britain so many skilled workmen, that our own market, at least, was ours for an infinite variety of iron-ware, and we have held it in many departments of the business from that day to this, no nation having been able to undersell us in our own streets. If, sir, we are now paying too high for iron and steel-ware, we are but suffering the penalty of our folly. Had we continued the protection afforded by the tariff of 1842, or modified it from time to time as branches of business and the condition of the market required, by transferring the duties that had defended and advanced a branch of industry to articles needing greater protection, we would now be producing an adequate supply of cheap iron for our own use, and competing with France and England in the markets of Mexico and Central and South America. We are thus, I say, paying the penalty of our own folly in having destroyed our industry and rendered the investment of capital in manufacturing enterprises insecure. Let but the capitalists of the country know that Congress will so revise the duties on railroad iron as to give it adequate protection over the taxation its production encounters under the law for raising internal revenue, and competition will spring up all over the country and wake from the growth of our own lands cheaper and better iron or steel rails than we can import.

How can it be otherwise? Do not the people of Michigan and Wisconsin wish to develop their resources and make them available? Are the people of Missouri insensible to the advantages which would flow from deriving income from the conversion of their mountains of ore into rails, machinery, and hardware? Will not the people of Tennessee allow the descendants of the colored men who worked his furnaces and gave Cave Johnson his majority in his first contest for Congress, and others like them, to enrich that devastated State by working her mines and bringing her forges and furnaces again into profitable use? And why may not the whir of the rolling-mill be heard throughout Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, Georgia, and other southern States which are heavily underlaid with iron? There will be quick demand for the yield of all if we determine to develop the wealth of our whole country, and interlace its parts, as we should, with railroads. By excluding from our markets one third of the anual export of railroad and bar iron from England we will bring hither the men who make it. Why should we, with the capacity established in five years—for when the war began and furnished its incidental protection, the manufacture of steel was unknown in our country—why should we, who in five years have created facilities for manufacturing about fifty thousand tons of steel per annum, buy from England one half of her entire export of unwrought steel? Rather let us enfeeble her and strengthen our country by bringing hither the men who make it. The iron of the States I have named, and I may say of almost every State of the Union, would give us steel as pure and tenacious as England can make. The establishment of this branch of trade would lead to immense internal commerce, and reward our railroads with business that would flow both ways in all seasons of the year. The ores of the Marquette region will be in request in every iron-producing State as those of Sweden, Norway, Russia, and Nova Scotia are in France and England.

WHY AN EXPORT DUTY SHOULD BE LAID ON COTTON.

Mr. Chairman, permit me, in drawing to a conclusion, to repeat that we need not resort to the prohibitions which have been practiced by other countries. Our natural advantages and those which spring from our personal freedom, are sufficient to relieve us from all difficulty on this point. There is, however, one of our agricultural productions upon which, did the Constitution permit, I would lay an export duty; and that is cotton. And I hope the Constitution will be so amended as to permit it; for though for years—for the life of more than a generation—the country was ruled in the interest of slavery, to the destruction of the interests and rights of our free laborers, by the pretended apprehension that if American cotton were not cheapened rival fields would be developed, the delusion has been dispelled, and all men know that ours are the only available cotton fields of the world. For five years we maintained along the coast of the cotton States a blockade such as never was attempted before. The people of those States planted no cotton and burned much of what they had produced, and did all that madness or ingenuity could suggest to develop rival fields if any existed; and what is the result? Necessity constrained the temporary use of Indian cotton, and Calcutta became so rich that her ryots put silver tires around their cart wheels. But when the power of our armies had reopened the cotton fields of the South, when it became known that freedmen were working upon the Sea Islands, and apparent that our Government was again to possess the cotton region of the South, there came a fearful revulsion in India, and all men acknowledged that God had given the United States a monopoly of the available cotton fields of the earth. Upon that one production we should put an export duty, and the result would be that the men of the cotton States, no longer dependent on England for a market for their bulky raw material, would, with their cheaper fabrics, drive her cotton goods from the markets of the world. Though I would not, by legislation, prohibit the export of the elements of any branch of manufacture or machinery, I will endeavor to retain in the country many of the elements of manufactures that now go abroad, by making them more valuable in this country than in any other, and by impressing upon the American people the conviction, so long ago inculcated upon the people of Ireland by Dean Swift, that to enrich themselves they must "Carry out their own goods as much manufactured and bring in those of others as little manufactured as the nature of mutual commerce will allow."

To gratify our patriotic desires we need not resort to prohibitory duties. We can nationalize our policy by relieving from duty tea, coffee, and any raw material which we do not produce, but which enters into our manufactures or arts. I would give the wool-growers protection, but would stimulate the manufacture of carpets and increase the demand for American wool by admitting free of duty those low grades which we do not produce; and would lay light duties on those articles in the manufacture of which machinery has been perfected and large capitals have been accumulated, especially where the original cost of the machinery has been returned in profits; and would make them heavier and heaviest upon those branches of industry which are most feeble but give assurance of ultimate success. When we do this our country will cease to be a mere agglomeration of sections, and we will be a national people, homogeneous in our interests by reason of their immense diversity.

Such, sir, is my plan for enforcing the Monroe doctrine, acquiring Canada, paying the national debt, and by relieving the South of its embarrassment, recementing the shattered Union. The poor whites must be weaned from the rifle, net, and line, by the inducements of well-rewarded labor. Their idle wives and children may thus be brought to habits of order, method, and industry, and in a few years we shall cease to remember that in this nineteenth century, and under our republican Government, there were for several decades millions of people tending rapidly to barbarism. The same inducements will disclose, even to the eye of prejudice, the manhood of the freedman, and that kindly relation between the employer and his employé which exists throughout the busy North and East will spring up in the South. Oppressed and degraded as he has been, the colored man will find that there are fields open to his enterprise, and a useful and honorable career possible to him, and will prove that, like other men, he loves property and has the energy to acquire it, the ability to retain it, and the thrift to make it advantageous to himself, his neighbors, and his country.

Let us then measure our resources by experiment and open them to the enterprise of the world; and the question whether we owe three hundred or three thousand millions will, ten years hence, be one of trifling importance; and, as Andrew Yarrinton showed the people of England how to "outdo the Dutch without fighting," we will find peace hath her victories for us also; Canada will come to us like ripe fruit falling into the hands of the farmer; and if Maximilian remain in Mexico, it will be as the citizen of a republic and an adherent of the Monroe doctrine.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of the effect of the rebellion upon the relations of the late rebel States to the Federal Constitution it becomes necessary, at the outset, to assure ourselves that we use the word State in the right sense, for even in its application to political societies and governmental organizations it has essentially different significations. Its meaning is sometimes purely geographical. Sometimes it is used to designate the Government itself. By this word we sometimes mean the people constituting a political society, within certain geographical limits, in their highest sovereign capacity. They are then invested with all the attributes of sovereignty as such political society, and therefore constitute an absolutely sovereign State, a nation. England is such a State to-day. The people of England hold all sovereign powers in their highest form as people of England. They are not invested with one portion of them as people of England, and with another portion by virtue of some other political connection or condition. And England is an absolute sovereignty. Her government, whatever successive forms it takes, represents all possible sovereign power. Whether as a despotism, or a Commonwealth, or a constitutional monarchy, she is always the sovereign State of England. In another sense, quite distinct from all of these, this word designates a political society, within certain geographical limits, organized under a particular government. Such is its signification when applied to one of the States of the American Union. The State of New York is a political society, existing within defined boundaries, under the particular governmental organization which constitutes and keeps her one of the United States, or she is no State at all. New York is not an absolute sovereignty. Her people are invested with only a part of the powers and attributes of sovereignty as people of New York. They hold the rest as people of the United States.

The people of the United States together, in their two-fold relation to the State and the Union, constitute an absolute sovereignty, a complete State, like England. Such a State, although rude and only half-fledged, was each of the original thirteen before the adoption of the national Constitution. Such a State not one of them has been since the adoption of that Constitution. Such a State not one of those admitted since its adoption has ever been for a single moment. Its framers have given us everywhere, on the same ground, two co-existent governments, each perfect within its own sphere, and yet neither complete in itself nor independent of the other. Neither the States nor the national Government separate from each other are States or anything else known to the Constitution. They are complements of each other. The existence of each is essential to the existence of the other. The States, moving in their orbits round the central sun, the Constitution, form the great national system known as the American Union. If the central power of the Constitution is essential to the existence of the nation, so also is it essential to the existence of the States. When it shall be cut off from any one of the States, whatever else that State may become, whether a mere Territory or an independent sovereignty, it will no longer be a State of this Union. Although the people and the soil will remain, the body-politic known to the Constitution as an American State will have perished. In no State of the Union can the machinery of State government operate or exist for a moment if the vital force of the Federal Constitution is withdrawn, because there can be no State Constitution whereof the national Constitution is not the corner-stone, there can be no State officer whose official character is not based upon an oath to the national Constitution; when that foundation is destroyed, whatever else he may be, he is not an officer of an American State. Nor is a government administered by such officers a government of a State of the Union, whatever other thing unknown to the Constitution it may be.

Now, if from a State like England or France in our premises, we leap to a State like New York or Alabama in our conclusions, our reasoning may of course be fallacious. If we argue that all States, meaning such States as England, are immortal, and therefore a particular State, meaning such a limited State as Alabama, is immortal, the fallacy will be transparent and puerile. If we affirm that "a State cannot die," "a dead State is a solecism, an impossibility," referring to an absolute sovereignty like England, and therefore Alabama has never during the rebellion ceased to be a State of this Union, our error will be without excuse. All reasoning from a sovereign State, like England, to a limited State, like Alabama, will be utterly fallacious, because the analogy is utterly wanting.

But it is not true, sir, that even such sovereign States as England are immortal. They may perish through subjugation or by the voluntary surrender of their sovereignty without any such extraordinary visitation as the depopulation or submersion of their soil. It has been a common occurrence in human history. It has happened to Ireland, Poland, and scores of other nations by subjugation. Absolute sovereignty was lost to Texas and to the old thirteen States by voluntary surrender. The soil of Scotland is still above the sea. Her people are there. She is not without government. Even her old name remains. But the sovereign State of Scotland has disappeared from the face of the earth. It is dead.

These propositions respecting the immortality of States are not true, then, even when applied to such complete sovereignties as England, Scotland, Poland, or the aggregate American Republic. They are still more erroneous when applied to these limited sovereignties, the States of the American Union.

If the people of Pennsylvania were invested with the highest capacity of sovereignty as people of Pennsylvania, in which case Pennsylvania would belike France, absolutely sovereign and independent, then would it indeed be true that whatever changes might befall her, short of actual loss of sovereignty by surrender or subjugation, she would, whether as a despotism, a constitutional monarchy, or a republic, always remain the sovereign State of Pennsylvania. But the people of Pennsylvania are not invested with the highest capacity of sovereignty as people of Pennsylvania, but as people at once of Pennsylvania and of the United States; and when the constitutional relation between the State and the Union is broken up, although the people and soil and name may remain, yet the thing known to the Constitution as the State of Pennsylvania dies as surely as the branch dies if severed from the tree.

I will indicate, sir, a few of the forms in which death, welcome or unwelcome, may overtake one of the States of the American Union.

If those who assert that, "Alabama, once a State must always be a State," that "the State of Alabama can never die," only mean that her soil will, unless depopulated or submersed, always remain with her people upon it, under one name and form of government or another, the proposition is worth neither asserting nor answering. It amounts to nothing more than that physical geography will remain as it is unless changed. If, however, the proposition means that the State of the American Union known to the Constitution as the State of Alabama must always remain such, it is not true.

In the first place, the national Constitution itself provides for the most quiet and orderly death and burial of such an "immortal" State. The framers of that instrument have deliberately and precisely indicated the proceedings by which Alabama might have ceased to be a State of the Union, have actually prescribed her funeral ceremonies. And these proceedings and ceremonies are so utterly devoid of pomp and circumstance that six votes may be decisive of her fate, of which six votes only two need be cast by her own citizens.

The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution stands in these words:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

If, therefore, the Legislatures of Alabama and Mississippi had, by a majority of one vote in each branch, enacted the political death of these two States, and the organization of a new State with a new name by a junction of the two, and if Congress had a few days later, by a majority of one in each branch, ratified this arrangement, then would the last have been heard of the "immortal" State of Alabama. The map would no longer show even her name. Into such a narrow, unhonored grave collapses the huge balloon of State immortality. Against the erection of a new State by the junction of Alabama and Mississippi would perhaps be urged the grave constitutional objection that such a subtraction of one from the number of the States, without a corresponding diminution of the number of stars on our flag, would make "that flag a flaunting lie." But then an appeal to the paint pot would obviate this objection.

Again, Rhode Island, for example, may in the distant future be driven by the exigencies of history from commerce and manufactures back to agriculture. Depopulated by emigration and miserably poor, she may grow weary of the burden of her State government and come to regard it as a curse rather than a blessing. If Rhode Island shall then abrogate her State constitution, rescind her ratification of the national Constitution, vacate every State office, repeal every law, recall from Congress her Senators and Representatives, solemnly renounce forever all her rights as a member of the Union, and ask the Federal Government and her sister State of Massachusetts to permit her to become again, what she had been for thirty years preceding 1662, a part of the State of Massachusetts—what, sir, becomes of the State of Rhode Island? She is politically dead. The people remain, the land remains, both subject to the Federal Constitution; but that organization of political society, under the Constitution, within her borders, which constituted and kept her a State of the Union no longer exists. That limited sovereignty which she formerly cherished as a blessing she has now thrown away as a curse. If, in compliance with her request, she is annexed to Massachusetts, her last vestige of separate sovereignty is irretrievably lost. It will be idle for her afterward, in the day of returning prosperity, to insist upon resuming, at her pleasure, her functions as a State, on the preposterous plea that once a State she always was and still is a State, and has lost none of her State rights under the Constitution.

If she is not annexed to Massachusetts she becomes at once a part of the unorganized territory of the United States. A territorial government is then to be speedily provided. And if, becoming rich and strong once more, she desires to resume her State sovereignty, she has no other door of entrance into the Federal Union than that provided in the Constitution for the admission of new States.

If in all this Rhode Island should make no attempt to join a hostile Power, should perform no hostile act, should manifest no purpose to harm the Republic, nevertheless she could not, after her voluntary abrogation of all her rights and functions as a State, insist upon her constitutional right to resume those functions at her pleasure without the acquiescence of the Federal Government or the other States. The question of her political death she assumed to decide for herself, as she had a right to do; but upon the question of her resurrection it would be for Congress to speak.

Now, suppose that she had rescinded her ratification of the Federal Constitution, renounced her allegiance to it and her rights under it, and recalled from Congress her Senators and Representatives, without abrogating her State constitution or vacating her State offices; then would her condition be, if possible, more fatal than in the case first supposed to all claim to the rights of one of the sovereign States of the Union. Having with her own hand severed the constitutional bond which sustained the State relation and existence, the affected retention of a State government would have been in itself a menace, a preposterous claim of independent sovereignty within the geographical limits of the Union, in open defiance of the Constitution, and at the expense of the national existence, which claim self-preservation and the maintenance of the Constitution would compel the national Government to crush.

South Carolina repealed the ordinance by which she had ratified the Federal Constitution, renounced all interest in and allegiance to the Union, called home her Senators and Representatives, and yet affected to retain her State government. Certainly this, if persisted in for four years, would not only have remitted her to a territorial condition, under the Constitution, and rendered the assent of the Federal Government necessary to her resumption of the functions of a State, but would have compelled the national Government to crush her menacing, dangerous pretense of independent sovereignty within the territorial limits of the Republic. In the absence of traitorous or criminal intent, and of lasting peril to the Union, the country would naturally have been most lenient as to the conditions of her reconstruction, would have welcomed her back as the joyful father welcomed the returning prodigal.

But South Carolina, like the other rebel States, went further than that. She took another step which gave a worse complexion to her case. She undertook to transfer her allegiance to a hostile government which could only exist on the ruins of ours, and waged war against the Union for four years, seeking not merely the injury but the disintegration and absolute ruin of the Republic. And yet it is claimed that during this whole time she actually remained a State of the Union, with such sovereignty and such rights as the Constitution secures to the States of the Union, with the right at any moment when the whim seized her, before, at, or after her defeat, to drop the sword and resume, unquestioned, her place among the States; that her practical relations to the Constitution were merely disturbed by the war.

Sir, these relations were not merely disturbed; they were utterly destroyed. Among the relations which she sustained to the Union were eight, vital in their character, affecting respectively the Federal revenues, the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, the official oaths of State officers, allegiance to the United States, representation in the Federal Congress, the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, the effect to be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the other States, and the Federal regulation of our foreign affairs and inter-State commerce. In not one of these relations has there been, during four years, one single spark of life. They, and the State whose breath and blood they were, are dead, and the trump of her resurrection will be something else than the whistle of a secretary's proclamation. It is true that she has not shaken off the national sovereignty; that not by the mere pendency of war, but only by final success in war, could she escape her obligations to the Union and the Constitution. But on the other hand, it is equally true that her acts, although powerless and void to take her out of the jurisdiction of the Constitution, did terminate her State existence; and therefore consign her to the condition of an unorganized territory, to be organized as a Territory or admitted as a State, according to the judgment and discretion of the Congress of the nation.

It is urged by the earnest champions of the immortality of these States, that the provision of the Constitution which binds the United States to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government is a pledge of intervention to States, as States, not Territories; and therefore the clause, in fact, provides not only for a guarantee of a republican form of government to the States, but also for a guarantee of their perpetuity as States.

Sir, this doctrine of a double-headed guarantee will bear no scrutiny. Neither standing alone nor construed by the context will the clause yield such a twofold guarantee. Every word used is essential to the single guarantee of a republican form of government. And it is but a shabby compliment to the wisdom of the statesmen who framed the Constitution, to say that they have, in one section, bound the United States to guaranty that Alabama shall live forever as a State of the Union, after having, in the very next preceding section, deliberately provided a most unostentatious ceremony whereby six votes might finally decide for her the question of life or death. But this is the precise compliment which this doctrine of a double guarantee pays to the framers of our Constitution; for if that instrument has, in one section of the fourth article, guaranteed that Alabama shall forever remain a State, it has also in another section of the same article guaranteed that Alabama may cease to be a State whenever her death-warrant shall be signed by her own Legislature, with the assent of the Legislature of an adjacent State and of Congress.

Not only does this provision contain no guarantee that she shall always remain the State of Alabama, but it involves no guarantee that she shall always remain a State, or a part of a State, under any name or form. It is nothing more than it purports to be—a provision for a guaranty of republican governments to the States of this Union, while they are States, leaving the question whether they shall forever remain States to be decided by something outside of this section. It might as well be claimed that the clause which guaranties full faith and credit in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State, guaranties also that the States shall always remain States because the pledge is made to the States. It might as well be claimed that the section which guaranties to the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States also guaranties that such citizens shall always remain citizens, shall never, by crime or expatriation, or otherwise, lose or throw off their citizenship, because the pledge is made to citizens.

Nor can you find, sir, anywhere in the Constitution a guarantee that a State shall never put off the garments of State sovereignty, never, through the crime or choice of her citizens, return to the territorial condition. There is no such provision expressed or implied in the Constitution. There ought to be no such provision there. The time may come when it will be a grievous hardship for a particular State to be forcibly compelled, by the United States, to maintain against her own interest and choice the burden of a State government. The time has already come when it will be an intolerable hardship to the rest of the Union to permit States, which, attempting murder, perpetrated suicide, to become living States again without security against future crime.

Nor is it true that if these rebellious communities were Territories and not States, their people could not have been traitors against the United States. For Territories are subject to the Federal Constitution and laws no less than States. There is nothing in this condition any more than in that of States to absolve their citizens from allegiance to the Federal Constitution or diminish the turpitude of the crime of treason against the United States. So far as the punishment for treason is concerned, if the doctrine that they were States in the Union has any advantage over the doctrine that they were States out of the Union, it rests upon the ground that in a conflict of State and Federal allegiance the Federal Constitution is paramount for States in the Union, and a nullity for the States out of the Union. But the position that they were mere Territories of this Union has this advantage over both, that for the people of a Territory the Federal Constitution is not only the paramount but the sole bond of allegiance.

Nor does this doctrine entail upon the United States as conquerors the payment of any portion of the rebel debt. Not upon this foundation, if upon any, can rest the claim that the nation, which, without intermission, struggled to subdue the rebels, became, when successful, bound by the law of nations to pay, to foreign or domestic creditors, the debts incurred in resisting its authority. Whatever liabilities may result from the doctrine that South Carolina left the Union and incurred debts as a sovereign State, or as a member of a sovereign confederacy, which doctrine I repudiate; whatever liabilities may result from the doctrine that during the war she remained a State of the Union and incurred debts as such State, which doctrine I also repudiate; it is very clear that the only payments which her European creditors can hope to realize from meddling with our territories, will be such as can be made through the thwarts of old Farragut's guns.

In my judgment, then, the constitutional relation of these communities to the Federal Government is that of unorganized territories. But they sustain at the same time another relation; that of the conquered to the conqueror under the laws of war. If it would be the right and duty of the Government to maintain the authority of the Constitution and the integrity of the Republic, by crushing a claim to absolute sovereignty on the part of a State, even though such State should not herself first draw the sword, still clearer will be the right, still more imperative the duty of the Government, if the State herself first flies to arms, and, in alliance with other armed enemies, attempts to destroy the nation.

And the right to draw the sword in defense of the national existence is the right to hold the sword unsheathed until such defense is completely achieved and crowned with solid guarantees of future security and peace. The doctrine to which the Democratic party has steadily adhered, since the day of its enunciation by Mr. Buchanan, is that the Republic had no right to resist by force of arms the attempt of the rebels on its life because "the Constitution contains no provision authorizing the coercion of a sovereign State." Others believed that in the clauses authorizing Congress to provide for the common defense and general welfare, for calling forth the militia to execute the laws and suppress insurrections, for arming and governing the militia, and for the punishment of treason, and requiring the President, who is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, could be found ample authority to defend the Republic by force of arms against the assaults of a State as well as against assaults from any other quarter.

But the existence of this power in the Federal Government is not dependent upon constitutional provisions. Its expression in the written Constitution would be only a formal recognition of a power which would exist, valid and complete, whether so recognized or not. The American people organized into political society under the State and national Governments are, in the aggregate, invested with all the inherent rights and attributes of sovereignty which belong to any independent nation.

First and foremost among these is the right of self-preservation, which is as clearly inherent in nations as in individuals, is indeed inseparable from the very idea of national sovereignty. It can neither be strengthened nor impaired by written constitutions; and if any nation on the face of the earth has the inherent right to defend itself against foreign or domestic foes, this Republic has that right; and the defense must be made decisive and complete. If it was the right of the nation to undertake the war, it was the duty of the nation to carry it forward to its legitimate end. That end is the solid rock of national salvation. It was to be expected, sir, that the northern men who could assert that the Republic had no right to resist, by arms, an armed attempt upon its life would not hesitate to assert also that the belligerent rights of the nation terminated at the instant of the military surrender of the rebel armies. But the second proposition is as false as the first. This nation was not, at the instant of military victory, to be, as in the twinkling of an eye, stripped of the right to exact securities for future life and peace, which pertains to all belligerent Powers, unless the war was waged, not for national salvation, but for military triumph. But if we undertook and waged this war for the achievement of military victory, we are the bloodiest butchers in the annals of our race.

These rebel communities sustain, therefore, the twofold relation of inhabitants of Territories subject to the Constitution, and of enemies conquered in war. All the rights springing from both of these relations vest in the United States; and it is at the option of the United States to exercise one class or the other, or both, in the reconstruction of the late rebel States.

How and by what department of the Government are those rights which vest in the nation as the sovereign of the Territories to be exercised? Fortunately we are not without beacons, set in the Constitution, to guide us forward from the point where the civil authority succeeds the military power. In the first place the control of the Territories is vested in Congress. If in the judgment of Congress it shall be necessary to organize and govern the late rebel States as Territories, upon Congress will devolve the duty of providing for their organization and government. In the next place, the power to admit new States is given to Congress. And when in the judgment of Congress it shall be proper to admit these Territories as States of the Union, it will be for Congress to provide the necessary legislation. And finally, the Constitution provides that "the United States shall guaranty to each State in this Union a republican form of government," not quibbling over a distinction between form and substance, but indicating the kind of government to be guarantied, as distinguished from monarchical or other forms. Is the authority for the practical realization of this guarantee vested in the Federal or in the State governments? On this point there is no such ambiguity in the Constitution as appears in the clause relating to fugitives from labor. Its language is explicit. The United States are to enforce the guarantee.

And yet, when we inquire into the precise method prescribed for its enforcement, the case is not so clear. Other powers are given to Congress, to the judicial department, to the President. But this is not specially assigned to either department of the Government. It is given to the United States. How, then, will the United States practically execute the provision? In my judgment, the power is to be exercised by Congress when the act to be performed for the realization of the guarantee is a legislative act, by the President when executive action is proper, and by the judicial department when judicial action is demanded, and, in general, by those branches of the Federal Government whose functions embrace the acts to be performed.

If an existing State should throw off the republican form and become a monarchy, it would be necessary to cure the evil, although, perhaps, difficult either to indicate or execute the remedy. But in the case of States applying for admission to the Union there can be no such difficulty. An act of Congress is the only machinery for the enforcement of the guarantee.

This provision has hitherto remained virtually a dead letter as against the despotism of slavery, because slavery has hitherto maintained for its own benefit a law higher than the Constitution, has in fact held the Constitution itself in chains. Now that a million bayonets have emancipated the Constitution as well as the slaves, it is time that this provision should cease to be a dead letter, that the word republican should cease to reek with the slime of slavery. If Congress shall be false to the obligation imposed by this provision it will not now, as heretofore, be able to plead the fear of a power higher than the Constitution as a justification for setting at naught the letter of the Constitution and the law of God.

Our rights of conquest are, in my judgment, subject to no limitations except those of humanity. The Republic is the sole judge of the extent of these limitations, and is, under the law of nations, responsible to no human tribunal for the manner in which these rights are exercised. The fact that the southern people were subjects of the Constitution, as well as enemies in war, affects not the extent of our rights of conquest, but only the question who shall exercise them.

The President is not the war power of the nation. He is a conspicuous part, but not the whole of it. Under the Constitution Congress declares war, grants letters of marque and reprisal, makes rules concerning captures on land and water, raises and supports armies, provides and maintains a navy, makes rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, provides for calling forth, arming, and disciplining the militia, and exercises exclusive authority over all forts, arsenals, magazines, and dock-yards. The President is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy which Congress raises and provides. Here, as elsewhere, he executes the laws which Congress enacts. That part of the war power which is legislative in its nature belongs to Congress. That which is executive belongs to the President. Such a division is unknown to absolute monarchies; and hence they can afford us in this case neither precedents nor principles. With a foreign nation he may make peace, by virtue of his treaty-making power, and yet even then his action will be rendered nugatory by a renewed declaration of war. But when Congress recognizes war in insurrection he has no power to conclude or proclaim peace except such as is bestowed and may be resumed by Congress. The President is bound to obey all constitutional laws of Congress relating to war, just as he is bound to obey any other constitutional laws. To those whom the virtual dictatorship of the President, enforced by circumstances during the war, has not wholly blinded to the constitutional line of demarcation between the legislative and executive departments of the Government, it cannot be difficult to determine which of these rights are to be exercised by Congress and the President, respectively, in this case.

If the mere pendency of war exempted the rebels from the jurisdiction of our Constitution, then had the President and Senate the constitutional power, not indeed to reannex them, but to give them absolute independence, before or after the surrender of their armies, and so to cast them off beyond the reach of Congress, because the treaty-making power is vested in the President and Senate. But this treaty-making power being unexercised, everything would devolve on Congress except the mere maintenance of order through the Army and Navy until Congress could express its will in legislation. If, however, the late rebel States did not, as the result of the mere pendency of war, become separate States, the whole power to dispose of them rests without restriction or limitation in the legislative department of the Government. The only constitutional power of the President over them, after actual hostilities ceased, is to preserve order by means of the Army and Navy until the voice of the law-making power can be heard. This would be all different in Russia. It will sooner or later be all different here, if we suffer the executive strain upon our Constitution which we have tolerated as a necessity in time of war to be perpetuated in time of peace.

But gentlemen affirm that it is now all different here; that the entire political work of reconstruction intervening between the cessation of hostilities and the scrutiny of credentials by the election committees of Congress, devolves on the President as Commander-in-Chief. And they present this reasoning in support of the position. The military surrender of the rebels on the field of battle must, it is said, be followed as an act of justice by a surrender on the field of political controversy. Whoever had the right to dictate the terms of the military surrender, has also the right to dictate the terms of the political surrender. The former right belonged to the President. Therefore the latter also belonged to him. This right to insist upon what is termed a political surrender, is probably a cautious expression for the right of conquest. It must be that or nothing. For certainly it can only be derived from the relation of the conquered to the conqueror under the law of nations, unless you look to the relation of the sovereign to unorganized territory under the Constitution. In no event can it possibly exist as against a State of the Union. But the objection to this reasoning is, that there is no truth in the main proposition. The possession of this right in the one case does not involve the possession in the other. The right to fix the conditions of the military surrender devolved upon the President because he was the military Commander-in-Chief, and what he did lay strictly within the scope of his military duty. But the political surrender, if you please to call it such, is quite another thing, and lies just as certainly without the scope of his military duty.

It will not do, sir, to say that the rebels, having the power to choose, selected him as the functionary to whom they would surrender, and thereby invested him, at their own option, with functions not provided by the Constitution. They surrendered to him, because there was no other Commander-in-Chief to whom they could surrender. And he accepted their surrender in the only capacity in which he could accept it, in his military capacity. Neither they nor he could transform the power which executes the laws into the power which makes them, any more than they could invest the chief judicial officer with the functions of law-maker or Commander-in-Chief.

Now, if gentlemen shall appeal to the American people, or to this Congress, to ratify and legalize particular measures of a heroic and patriotic President, adopted in the exercise of his discretion as a military commander and civil ruler compelled to bear a burden of overwhelming responsibility on an untrodden road, to this appeal the people and this Congress will, I doubt not, respond with a generosity which will go as near as stern justice and plighted faith will permit to the extreme verge of the Constitution. But when they appeal to our grateful admiration for a man who stood like a rock against the storms of treason on the soil of Tennessee, and ask us, not to ratify particular measures, but to admit them to have been absolutely valid and constitutional in their inception, and within his exclusive jurisdiction, they ought to be able to lay their hands upon that article of the Constitution which authorizes the President to create and fill the office of civil Governor of one of these States; which they pronounce just as truly States of the Union now as they were before the war; on that article which authorizes the Federal Executive to brush aside a State government as a cobweb, to summon a State constitutional convention, to prescribe the qualifications of electors, to prescribe the qualifications of members, to prescribe requisites of the new constitutions, to prescribe legislation for the new Legislatures. More than that, sir, they ought to be able to show us the very section and the very clause which transfer such sacred and time-honored rights of States as these to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; the very section and the very clause which invest him with such superhuman attributes that South Carolina can lie at his feet, a conquest of war, and yet at the same instant stand up before him "as truly a State of the Union as she was before the rebellion."

Sir, nothing of this kind stands written in the Constitution. Nor is there any truth in the plea that all this has been done, not in derogation but in aid of whatever of State sovereignty was left to South Carolina by the war. We have not waged this war against an abstraction called rebellion, but against living rebels. It was the people of the South who filled the rebel armies as officers and soldiers, who maintained and directed the rebel State governments, who provided means to carry on the war. They have not been fighting on our side against their own State governments and their own rebellion; they have not, for four years, supplicated us for deliverance from their own rebellion and rulers. If these communities were indeed States of the Union when the rebellion collapsed, "just as truly as before the war," their governments were just as truly State governments; for no man can deny that they rested on whatever of State rights and sovereignty remained to their people. And granting that South Carolina remained a State of the Union, she had the right to choose and keep her Governor if she had any rights at all; she had the right, if she had any rights at all, to decide whether and when she would have a new or an amended constitution; what should be the qualifications of her electors and of her constitution-makers; what should be the character of her new constitution and of her State legislation, subject only to the requirements of the Federal Constitution itself.

Sir, the man who asks us so to trample down cardinal principles of our Constitution ought to bear in mind that this will have to do, not merely with the present but also with the future; that the power which, by this subversion of the constitutional barriers between the legislative and executive branches of the Government, he would to-day put into the hands of a patriot, may to-morrow fall into the hands of a traitor; he ought to take heed lest the Democratic party, a frozen, harmless copperhead to-day, warmed to life to-morrow in his own bosom, sting to death the nation which the President has done so much to save.

Mr. Chairman, there is a tide in the affairs of nations, as of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune. The Republic rocks upon a flood-tide now. It is for this Congress to seize or lose a golden opportunity which centuries may not bring back. And when history shall summon us to judgment, the attempt to shift this burden of responsibility from our own to the President's shoulders will meet the scorn and execration which it merits.

For one I will attempt no such evasion of duty. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. Raymond] exhorted you to remember that they who have fallen in this war on either side are the nation's dead, and their courage and devotion the priceless possession of the Republic; when he sought thus to blind your eyes by tears shed over rebel graves to the enormity of the crime he would have you perpetrate upon the name and race of my black comrades in arms, who have died that this nation might live, I felt again something of the pain with which I heard that a Federal officer had drunk wine with the butcher of Fort Pillow, while his hands yet dripped with the blood of his victims. I, too, believe in brotherly love; but it is in that brotherly love which is radiant in the light of God's justice, not in that which, turning its back on loyal whites and loyal blacks, weeps with living oppression over the grave of dead treason. "The nation's dead!" Ay, sir, dead patriots and dead traitors. If the distinction between loyalty and treason has so soon disappeared in the quicksands of our consciences, it nevertheless stands written in fire on millions of bereaved loyal hearts in this Republic. No such sentimentality as this shall serve as my pretext for delivering over the loyal whites of the South to the torments of baffled treason, or for breaking the nation's faith plighted to the freedmen. Never, through my vote, shall rebels have any power either to pay the debt incurred in the attempt to destroy the Republic, or to repudiate the debt incurred in its salvation. Never, with my consent, shall one bloody-minded, bloody-handed traitor of South Carolina have greater power on this floor than three bullet-ridden patriots of Wisconsin. More than that, sir: never, with my consent, shall another Representative from South Carolina enter this Hall until her black patriots shall be equal at the ballot-box to her white traitors.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio, obtained the floor. And then, on motion of Mr. KELLEY, (at fifteen minutes after ten o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present to the Senate the memorial of William A. Buckingham and divers other prominent citizens of Norwich, in the State of Connecticut, asking for an appropriation for the improvement of the river Thames; also, a communication from his Excellency the Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and another from his Excellency the Governor of the State of New Hampshire, commending the subject to the favorable consideration of Congress. These papers are very brief, and the subject is one of great importance, not merely to the people in the locality, but to the adjacent States, and the Chair would therefore ask the permission of the Senate that these papers may be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce. If there be no objection that order will be entered. It is so ordered.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of the common council of the city of St. Louis, the county court of St. Louis county, and the Union Merchants' Exchange, of the city of St. Louis, praying that Congress will grant the necessary authority to the citizens of St. Louis and to the citizens of the State of Illinois to construct and maintain a bridge over the Mississippi river at that point; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLEY. I present the petition of Mrs. Mary E. Twiford, setting forth that through her instrumentality—and the accompanying papers seem to establish the fact—the capture of Norfolk took place by her signaling our fleet, and that, in consequence of that manifestation of her loyalty, her house with all she had was burned up. She offers her memorial setting forth these facts, with the accompanying papers proving the allegations in the memorial to that effect, and asking for relief either for the property she lost in consequence of that act, or for compensation for the services rendered by her to the United States. I move the reference of the papers to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a petition of settlers on the absentee Shawnee lands of Kansas, praying that they may be allowed to purchase those lands at $1 25 per acre; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 32) to prevent the absence of territorial officers from their official duties, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 113) in relation to public highways, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of a committee appointed at a meeting of the National Normal School Association, held at Harrisburg, August 15, 1865, praying for a grant of public lands to establish normal schools in each of the States, have had the same under consideration, and deeming legislation on the subject inexpedient, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was agreed to.

COLUMBIA AND WILLAMETTE RIVERS.

Mr. NESMITH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Columbia and Willamette rivers, and report by bill or otherwise.

CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTEES.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the joint committee on reconstruction be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the Constitution of the United States so as to declare with greater certainty the power of Congress to enforce and determine by appropriate legislation all the guarantees contained in that instrument, and more especially, first, that which recites the people, without distinguishing them by color or race, as those who are to choose Representatives; second, that which secures the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; third, that which enjoins upon the United States the guarantee to every State in the Union of a republican form of government.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire as to the expediency and constitutionality of extending the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over all suits brought against any person for acts done under the authority or in aid of the military forces of the United States, and also of all suits brought against any person for any act done under the authority or in aid of the so-called Confederate States, and report by bill or otherwise.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask permission of the Senate to say a word by way of giving information to the body, which I think it may be advisable to give. I was obliged to leave the Senate yesterday at a somewhat early hour on account of the fact that I was quite unwell. I understand that afterward a joint resolution was received from the House of Representatives and is now upon the table, proposing an amendment to the Constitution—a resolution reported from a joint committee upon which the Senate has placed me. I am not in a condition to ask the Senate to proceed with it to day, even if I deemed it advisable to press its consideration now. On reflection, that inasmuch as my friend from Illinois [Mr. TREMBULL] has under consideration an important bill with which he wishes to proceed, I have thought it advisable to defer it a day or two, and to say to the Senate that if nothing occurs to render that course unwise I shall ask them to take up the joint resolution on Monday morning and proceed with its consideration. I hope that then the Senate will be willing to consider it and to continue its consideration until it shall be finally acted upon. It is proper that it should be taken up and acted upon soon, because many of the State Legislatures are now in session, and if it is to pass, it is desirable to send it to them before many days shall have elapsed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 204) to regulate the registering of vessels; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MILITARY TRIAL OF DAVIS AND CLAY.

Mr. HOWARD. If there be nothing pressing before the Senate this morning, I move to take up the resolution that I submitted some time since in reference to the trial of Jefferson Davis.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HOWARD on the 10th of January:

Whereas by the report of the Secretary of War to the President, dated January 4, instant, it appears that Jefferson Davis, late president of the so-called Confederate States, is now held in custody, charged with the crimes of having incited the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and with the murder of soldiers of the United States held as prisoners of war during the rebellion, and other cruel and barbarous practices, in violation of the rules and usages of civilized warfare; and whereas by the same report it appears that Clement C. Clay is also held in custody, charged with complicity in said assassination, and with organizing bands of pirates, robbers, and murderers in Canada, to burn the cities and ravage the commerce and coasts of the United States on the British frontier, in violation of the same rules and usages: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That it be respectfully recommended to the President that said Jefferson Davis and Clement C. Clay be, without unnecessary delay, tried by a military commission upon said charges.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer an amendment to the resolution to come in at its close:

Or such other crimes in violation of the usages of war as may be preferred against them or others acting in concert with them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those words will be added to the Senator's resolution; as it is his own resolution, and it is within his power to modify it.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, on the 21st of December last, I submitted to the Senate a resolution of inquiry respecting Jefferson Davis, in which the President of the United States was requested to inform the Senate upon what charges and for what reasons he was held in confinement and why he had not been put upon his trial. In answer to this resolution of the Senate, the President sent to us in a brief message two statements, the one being a communication from the Secretary of War, dated the 4th of January, and the other emanating from the Attorney General of the United States of the same date. In the former communication the Secretary of War informs the President—

"1. That Jefferson Davis was captured by United States troops in the State of Georgia, on or about the 10th day of May, 1865, and by order of this Department has been, and now is, confined in Fortress Monroe, to abide such action as may be taken by the proper authorities of the United States Government.

"2. That he has not been arraigned upon any indictment or formal charge of crime, but has been indicted for the crime of high treason by the grand jury of the District of Columbia, which indictment is now pending in the supreme court of said District. He is also charged with the crime of inciting the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, and with the murder of Union prisoners of war, by starvation and other barbarous and cruel treatment toward them.

The President deeming it expedient that Jefferson Davis should first be put upon his trial before a competent court and jury for the crime of treason, he was advised by the law officer of the Government that the most proper place for such trial was in the State of Virginia. That State is within the judicial circuit assigned to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who has held no court there since the apprehension of Davis, and who declines for an indefinite period to hold any court there.

The matters above stated are, so far as I am informed, the reasons for holding Jefferson Davis in confinement, and why he has not been put upon his trial.

The Secretary adds:

Besides Jefferson Davis, the following persons who acted as officers of the rebel government are imprisoned, to wit: Clement C. Clay, at Fortress Monroe, charged among other things with treason, with complicity in the murder of Mr. Lincoln, and with organizing bands of pirates, robbers, and murderers in Canada to burn the cities and ravage the commerce and coasts of loyal States on the British frontier; D. L. Yulee, at Fort Pulaski, charged with treason while holding a seat in the United States Senate, and with plotting to capture the forts and arsenals of the United States, and with inciting war and rebellion against the Government; S. R. Mallory, at Fort La Fayette, charged with treason, and with organizing and setting on foot piratical expeditions against the United States commerce and marine on the high seas.

Other officers of the so-called confederate government, arrested and imprisoned, have been released on parole to abide the action of the Government in reference to their prosecution and trial for alleged offenses, on their applications for amnesty and pardon. Among these are G. A. Trenholm, secretary of the treasury; John A. Campbell, assistant secretary of war; James A. Seddon, secretary of war; John H. Reagan, postmaster general; R. M. T. Hunter, senator; Alexander H. Stephens, vice president, and sundry other persons of less note.

It seems that the Attorney General of the United States, in answer to a request made him by the President, has given an opinion upon a question of law arising in these cases. The ground taken by the Attorney General of the United States is very plainly set forth in the communication which he has made to the President, and which has been laid before us; and in order that no injustice may be done him, I shall trouble the Senate with reading a few extracts from his communication to the President. The Attorney General says:

"When the war was at its crisis, Jefferson Davis, the commander-in-chief of the army of the insurgents, was taken prisoner, with other prominent rebels, by the military forces of the United States. It was the duty of the military so to take them. They have been heretofore and are yet held as prisoners of war. Though active hostilities have ceased, a state of war still exists over the territory in rebellion. Until peace shall come in fact and in law they can rightfully be held as prisoners of war."

Again, he says:

"In that clause of the Constitution mentioned in the resolution of the Senate, it is plainly written that they must be held in the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. I know that many persons of learning and ability entertain the opinion that the commander-in-chief of the rebel armies should be regarded as constructively present with all the insurgents who prosecuted hostilities and made raids upon the northern and southern borders of the loyal States.

"This doctrine of constructive presence, carried out to its logical consequences, would make all who had been connected with the rebel armies liable to trial in any State and district into which any portion of those armies had made the slightest incursion. Not being persuaded of the correctness of that opinion, but regarding the doctrine mentioned as of doubtful constitutionality, I have thought it not proper to advise you to cause criminal proceedings to be instituted against Jefferson Davis, or any other insurgent, in States or districts in which they were not actually present during the prosecution of hostilities."

It will be seen from this, Mr. President, that in the opinion of the Attorney General it is incompetent and unconstitutional to put any of the insurgents upon trial for treason in any State or district except that in which the crime was actually committed, and in which the accused was personally present at the time of the commission of the crime. This is a grave and important question, and I propose to trouble the Senate for a few minutes with its discussion, not relying with the utmost confidence upon my own opinions, but endeavoring to set forth my views upon this question of law with becoming brevity, and at the same time with such clearness as I may be master of.

One thing is certain, that if there be any expectation which has been more prevalent than another among the loyal people of the United States, it is that it is due to our dignity as a nation, it is due to the justice of the nation, it is due to the obligations which we owe to the Constitution and to the nation, that there should be an arraignment and punishment according to the forms of law at least of the ringleaders of this rebellion. I think that I do not overstate the truth when I say that this expectation is in no degree at this time diminished, but that unless some earnest bona fide endeavor shall be made to execute the law upon some at least of the traitors who have done such wrong to the Government of the United States, the feeling of disappointment, not to say disgust, will be very strong and pervading throughout the United States.

Davis was president of the rebel government, and, as such, commander-in-chief of its armies and navy. His commands, in carrying on the war, were supreme and irresistible. His will was the origin of every movement in conducting their operations. It pervaded and directed every hostile act. He was the master of the rebellion and gave it animation and activity throughout its whole extent, from the Atlantic to the Rio Grande. His commands directly or remotely, but in every case effectually and responsibly, caused every advance of the rebel forces, every attack, every battle, every death of the Union forces. His orders alone gave energy to every blow on every field in every State along the whole line of fifteen hundred miles from east to west, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Canadian frontier. It was his hand that shed the blood or caused the death of more than a quarter of a million of men and the waste and destruction of more than six thousand millions of property. His irresistible commands—irresistible to those subject to them—were present everywhere, at the first Bull Run, at Malvern Hill, at the battles on the Rappahannock, at Centerville, at Shiloh, at Vicksburg, at Gettysburg, as well as at the massacre of Fort Pillow, and other minor butcheries. He was the war. His sole will directed and controlled it everywhere. It was war, complete in form and attributes, not confined to a narrow theater compressed on all sides to small dimensions by the barriers of predominating loyalty, like Monmouth's rebellion in England, the rebellion of Shays in Massachusetts, or the whisky insurrection of Pennsylvania, but broad, pervading, covering in territorial extent almost scores of degrees of latitude and longitude, and bounded only by the long lines of bayonets, irregular and wavering, sometimes advancing and sometimes receding. It was war, both by land and sea. It had its neutralities, its battles, its sieges, its capitulations, its surrenders, its exchange of prisoners, its privateers, letters of marque, its blockades, its captures, prizes, flags of truce. And on the part of the rebels all these operations were carried on by and under the direction of one man, and he was Jefferson Davis, the supreme commander, who had full power to enforce his commands—a power given him by the whole rebel community as a political, organized community, holding and exercising for the time being—whether rightfully or wrongfully is wholly immaterial to the argument—an absolute national independence, though unrecognized by us or any foreign nation. Davis was the chief; he was the master and director of this immense, this wasteful, bloody, and most wicked war, and responsible for every drop of blood shed in it. His spirit, his intention and purpose, his will was everywhere; and though his physical arm did not give any blow, no blow was struck which was not directed by his mind, no Union soldier bled or languished who was not the victim of his traitorous malignity; and this though he was at Richmond, in Virginia, and his victim in Louisiana or Ohio.

The ground taken in the opinion of the honorable Attorney General is, that Davis cannot be tried for treason in any State or district in which he was not actually present in person during the prosecution of hostilities there; that is, that he being at Richmond, in Virginia, and such commander-in-chief, exercising such supreme control over his subordinates, and they fighting a battle in Ohio, cannot be put upon his trial in Ohio for the treason of fighting that battle. Such a trial he holds to be forbidden by the Constitution of the United States.

If this be a correct view of the instrument, then some very singular and most inconvenient consequences must flow from it.

Davis might have been standing but an arm's length south of the northern limit of Virginia, while his army was in Ohio fighting a battle under his immediate eye and orders on the north side of the line; and yet he could not be indicted and tried for fighting this battle in Ohio, because he was not personally and corporally present in the State of Ohio.

He might have posted himself just over the Canada line, or on an island of the British West Indies, and thence in person fitted out and directed expeditions against the lives and property of Union men—as, in fact, he did by his agents; expeditions to carry on the work of war, robbery, and murder—and not be guilty of treason, because he was not actually present within the State or district where hostilities took place.

And is it so? Is it true that the framers of the Constitution have left their work thus imperfect? Did they intend to cover with immunity from the responsibility of treason the man who should command and commit it, but who should happen to be personally and corporally at the time in another State or district whose people were so universally disloyal that a jury could not be found among them sufficiently loyal and virtuous either to convict or indict the offender? or the American citizen who, as a rebel and traitor, should hurl the bolts of war against his country from a foreign soil? Could they have contemplated such results? Did they intend that the ringleader, the author of the treason, should thus, by fortunate trickery or fortunate accident, escape the just penalty of his crime, while the subordinates who could not disobey his commands, but at the peril of their lives, are subjected to all the legal consequences of his crime? Is the judicial department of the Government in an attitude so ridiculous, so miserable and pitiable before the world, that it can punish only the men who fought the battle in Ohio under the constraint of instant death if they refused, but is without power to punish the leader, the director, the author of the bloodshed, because, forsooth, he stood upon the soil of Virginia at the time; or because, in the case of a rebel invasion from a foreign country, he was in that foreign country? Is it impotent to punish gigantic guilt endowed with perfect freedom of will and of choice, and powerful only to punish the guilt of weakness acting under a compulsion it is unable to resist?

If such be the law of the land, it surely demands the serious attention not only of the judiciary but of the American people at large.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 61, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand from the Senator from Michigan that he will conclude his remarks in a few moments. I am willing, therefore, that that bill should be laid aside informally until he concludes his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In compliance with the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois the bill before the Senate will be laid aside informally, if there be no objection. It is laid aside.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, with great respect for the legal attainments and high character of the Attorney General, I must take the liberty to dissent from his view of the law of treason as presented in his letter to the President, and beg the indulgence of the Senate for a moment in stating the grounds for my dissent.

Section three of article three of the Constitution, as framed in 1787, declares that—

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

It is quite plain that in this provision two kinds of treason are defined; the first consists simply and purely in levying war against the United States. As treason can be committed only by a citizen owing allegiance to the United States, this kind of treason must be perpetrated by a citizen, who is a rebel and traitor, seeking by levying war to overthrow the authority of the Government. It is insurrection or rebellion, in the proper and technical sense of the laws of nations. The other kind of treason consists not in levying war against the United States in the form of a rebellion or insurrection, but in adhering to the foreign enemies of the United States, and in giving aid and comfort to those enemies.

The crime in the first case is the levying of a rebellious war; in the second case it is the act of adhesion to our foreign enemies, evidenced or demonstrated by rendering those enemies material aid and security in prosecution of their hostilities against us. This overt act of adhesion might undoubtedly, and in most instances would, be committed within the limits of the United States; and there is not the slightest ground to doubt the power of Congress under the unamended Constitution to bring the offender to trial at any place they might select for the trial, for in section two of article three it is provided that—

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where said crimes shall have been committed; but where not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

By the sixth amendment to the Constitution, made in 1789, it is declared that—

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law," &c.

Now, as I understand the Attorney General, he must hold that both these kinds of treason—for this amendment makes no distinction as to the place or mode of trial—are to be tried within the district wherein the crime was committed; and that as to the crime of adhesion to foreign enemies, the clause I have cited from the unamended Constitution is repealed and annulled by the amendment. His proposition must necessarily lead to this result. The amendment makes no exception in favor of treasons committed out of the limits of the United States. It declares, in general terms, that in all criminal prosecutions the trial shall be had in the district wherein the crime shall have been committed. And if it was not committed within any district the conclusion seems irresistible that it cannot be had at all, and that hence Congress has been stripped of the power plainly given by the unamended instrument.

It is impossible to suppose that the learned Attorney General can accept a logical result so dangerous to the public security and interests. Surely he will not upon reflection insist that an American citizen who joins the foreign enemies of the United States in a foreign country, and there gives them aid and comfort, thus committing the overt act of treason as defined by the Constitution, is not triable and punishable for that high crime. He will not so construe the instrument as to give to every American citizen an open license to join the enemies of his country in foreign lands or on the high seas under which he can escape the doom of traitors. This would be such a narrow, strict construction as would bring upon us the derision of all other nations.

I put both kinds of treason upon the same footing as to the place of trial because the Constitution so places it. No argument can be urged as to the one kind that is not applicable to the other; and if I have shown the absurdity of the doctrine of actual corporeal presence in the case of an act of adhesion in a foreign country, it is worth our while to consider seriously whether it is not equally faulty as applied to acts of levying war by rebels.

An overt act of levying war must be committed, for the clause requires this overt act to be proved by two witnesses. This overt act is the evidence of the treason, of the crime charged, but is not necessarily the crime. On the trial of Colonel Burr for treason in 1807, before Chief Justice Marshall, that profound jurist, taking this clear distinction, remarked:

"The counsel for the prosecution have charged those engaged in the defense with considering the overt act as treason, whereas it ought to be considered solely as the evidence of the treason; but the counsel for the prosecution seem themselves not to have sufficiently adverted to this clear principle, that though the overt act may not be itself the treason, it is the sole act of that treason which can produce conviction. It is the sole point in issue between the parties. And the only division of that point, [the overt act,] if the expression be allowed, which the court is now examining, is the constructive presence of the prisoner at the fact charged."

The fact charged was the levying of war against the United States on Blennerhassett's Island, in the Ohio river, but within the State of Virginia.

Now, if it be a clear principle that the overt act is not necessarily the treason, but only evidence of it; that is to say, following out the reasoning of the Chief Justice, if the overt act may consist of something which, considered by itself and unconnected with an act of war, is not treason, but becomes evidence of treason only when connected by intention and conspiracy with the act of levying war, and if this overt act may be done, as it is often done, in a State or district different from the one in which the war is actually levied; if the overt act may not necessarily be the whole of the corpus delicti, (and the Chief Justice asserts this emphatically); if, in other words, the accused is not or need not be put on trial for the mere overt act except as connected with and forming a part, so to speak, of the corpus delicti, the levying of war; then undoubtedly the overt act may be committed in one district and the main act of levying of war in another; so that this principal act draws after it the overt act committed by the accused, thus making both one act. And in the cases I have put of the battles in Ohio and on the Canadian frontier, the commander of the rebel forces would be to all intents and purposes present as principal at the act of war. It is utterly impossible to suppose that any enlightened court would not hold him to be present according to the ancient and well-established principles of criminal law. The rule is that he is present at the commission of a felony who is near enough to the spot to aid and abet in it, with the intention to render aid, and in a condition to do so.

Foster, Hawkins, Hale, all concur, in stating the rule to be that—

"In order to render a person an accomplice and a principal in felony, he must be aiding and abetting at the fact or ready to afford assistance if necessary."

Judge Marshall adds the words:

"That is, at the particular fact which is charged, he must be ready to give immediate and direct assistance."

And Foster adds, what is the undoubted rule of law:

"That when the law requireth the presence of the accomplice at the perpetration of the fact, in order to render him a principal, it doth not require a strict, actual, immediate presence, such a presence as would make him an eye or ear witness of what passeth."

No author has undertaken to state at what precise distance the accomplice must be from the scene in order to be present as a principal, for it is in the nature of things impossible to lay down any rule as to the distance or location of the person who is present. He must, of course, be leagued in the conspiracy and participate in the common object of the conspirators, and he must be ready to render assistance if necessary. This is the definition which the law gives of presence. It assumes not to go beyond it, or to establish metes and bounds; and the question whether the circumstances in proof come up to this definition, the question whether they make out presence at the perpetration of the crime, is not a question of law, but of fact for the jury, not the court, to pass upon.

If it be said that the accused must be actually in the district at the time and place of the commission of the act of treason, my reply is that the Constitution does not say so. It says his trial shall take place in the State or district wherein the crime was committed; and I have already shown that his being out of the district at the time is really immaterial; at any rate, it is not in itself such negative evidence as to relieve him from the charge of being present, aiding and abetting.

In order to commit the crime he must be present; that is, ready and able to render assistance. Legal presence cannot, therefore, be any more confined within geographical limits than acts of aid and assistance can be so confined; and surely the law does not assume to overrule the laws of nature, and say that an act which, by them, really and in point of fact gives such aid and assistance, does not accomplish that end because done within certain geographical limits. Such an idea defeats and destroys the real doctrine of presence as understood at the common law and as expounded by all courts and accredited writers. The being engaged in the general conspiracy, and being ready and able to assist in the perpetration of the crime, are the elements of legal presence; and whether that presence has been made out by the proofs is a question not for the court, but for the jury. Every fact and circumstance tending to show that the accused was engaged in the general conspiracy, was ready and was able to contribute aid, and did in some way contribute aid—in however remote a degree, and however minutely, as Chief Justice Marshall expresses it—in the commission of the crime, is admissible evidence to the jury of the guilt of the accused, of his legal presence as principal. To deny this is to impair and belittle the rule, to fritter it away, to deprive it of one half its efficacy by refusing it application to cases which must have been in contemplation of the authors of the Constitution.

And this doctrine of the legal presence of the offender and his guilt as principal in the jurisdiction where the crime is committed is in accordance with the decisions of American as well as English courts. The books of each country abound in cases showing it to be the rule of law that where the crime has been begun in one jurisdiction and is consummated in another, the act is, in contemplation of law, done where the crime becomes complete; and in case of a shot fired from one foreign country into another, by which a person in the latter is killed; or of a shot fired from on board a vessel of one country to that of another on the high seas, by which a person is killed on board the latter; or of the crime of counterfeiting or forging commenced in one State and consummated in another by agents, though innocent, of the offender; or of poison administered in one jurisdiction and destroying its victim in another; and even of a mortal blow struck in one country, of which the subject dies in another—all these cases go to show that in law the place of the consummation of the crime is the place where the principal is present and incurs the guilt. And it seems to me the rule is the plain and obvious dictate of good sense and common justice, and stands in need of no labored argument to give it practical effect.

It is true that Davis was in Virginia at the time the battles were fought in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and probably in Richmond. But that he was leagued in the conspiracy to fight those battles and all others that occurred all will admit, for he was the commander of all the rebel forces. That it was done under his commission and therefore by his procurement there can be no doubt, for he was the responsible head of every rebel military movement. That he was ready and able, though at Richmond, to render aid and assistance to the rebels who carried war into those States; that he actually did it by sending troops and supplies of money and arms, by couriers, spies, and telegraphic dispatches, and all the usual methods practiced by commanders in the field, cannot, I suppose, be doubted. And if he was thus ready and able and actually did such acts by way of aiding and abetting in those battles, he was in law and common sense as much "present" at the commission of the crime in those States and as much responsible as principal in them as was John Morgan or Robert E. Lee, his instruments. He was a principal traitor everywhere. The commissions he gave to his subordinates, his instructions to them, whether general or particular, authorizing acts of hostility, coupled with the irresistible power vested in him as commander-in-chief, made his presence ubiquitous, extending it and the guilt implied by it to every act of war by land or sea. The rule itself, devised by reason for the protection of civil society, as laid down by the ancient authors I have cited, feels no stretch, no violence, in being made to cover all such cases, and no construction of the rule falling short of this can come up to the true purposes of the Constitution.

I beg not to be misunderstood; I am speaking of Davis as president and commander-in-chief, having the powers notoriously possessed by him, pervading, despotic, resistless. While I hold him to have been everywhere present as a principal, in the sense of the rule of law, and consequently triable wherever the "crime was committed"—present in Virginia, in Tennessee, in Kentucky, in Ohio, in Pennsylvania, and in Vermont, (if the St. Albans raiders acted under his commission,) I do not claim that every other rebel, officer and soldier, was "constructively present" at the same times and places. The Attorney General, in his letter to the President, objects to what he denominates "constructive presence," that it implies, if carried out to its logical results, that every rebel was present and responsible for every act of war committed by any other rebel of whatever grade or condition. This, I must say, is a forced inference, and not justified at all, either by the reason of the rule or the terms in which it is usually expressed. To be present is to be aiding and abetting at the fact and ready to afford assistance; but it is not necessary that the party should be an eye or ear witness. All that is required is that he should be so situated that he can render assistance, and that he be willing and intending to assist.

Now, it is notorious that the rebellion has been attended on the part of Davis, as on our own part, by a division of territory into sundry military departments, to which were assigned separate departmental commanders, each with special powers over the troops assigned him, and independent of all others except the commander-in-chief, and each army has been subjected to the orders of a particular general responsible only to his superior in command. To hold, therefore, that each of these commanders, much less the soldiers under him, was present and responsible for whatever was done by any and all other persons in promoting the war—present at overt acts of which they knew nothing, and in which they could not participate if they would, is openly to violate the rule itself. It is to confound the distinction between the law and the fact, to force the rule to imply a different state of facts from that which it contemplates. Surely, neither Hood nor his men on the east side of the Mississippi were guilty of being present at the operations of Kirby Smith in another department on the west side. And why? Simply because they were not ready, able, willing, and intending to aid and assist him. They were not, as to Smith's particular overt acts, his accomplices, while at the same time Davis, who was able and willing and actually rendered aid, was the accomplice of each, and the accomplice of every man who raised his arm against his country during the war. He accepted that bad eminence; Lee accepted the next rank in the grandeur of infamy, perfidy, and murder; Breckinridge another, and others still had their separate parts assigned them in the great drama of treason and civil war. Surely the Attorney General does not mean to say that the rule of law relating to presence, as I have stated it from the books and from the highest adjudications, would make each of these subordinates as well as his men criminally responsible for what all the others did. And yet by using the expression "constructive presence," unknown both to the Constitution and to the common law as it respects treason, he leaves it to be inferred that some class or party among us embrace the absurd opinion that every rebel, high or low, was in contemplation of law present and responsible at the commission of the crime by every other, though in no situation to aid and abet that other; and seems to hold that while this constructive presence is legal absence, actual presence must imply, if not personal presence and immediate personal participation in the overt act, at least personal presence and participation within the boundaries of the State or district where the crime was actually committed. But properly speaking there is no such thing as constructive presence known to the law of treason, nor, indeed, any other felony. Those alone are present who either commit the criminal act or are leagued in the conspiracy and so situated in reference to that act as to be ready, able, and willing to assist in it. In all felonies except treason those who incite the crime or render assistance afterward, but who are not so situated at its perpetration, are accessories either before or after the fact. But as in treason the crime consists not in such accessorial acts but only in acts of levying war, there are none but principals, and a principal in felony must of course be one who is present.

The term "constructive presence," therefore, as employed by the learned Attorney General, if intending anything not implied by the accepted definition of legal presence, means exactly the contrary. Legal presence, I cannot doubt, comprehends, in the case of a commander, all military orders and acts of procuring, or, in other words, causing acts of war to be committed by his soldiers or subordinates, wherever given and done, and render him triable in any judicial district in his department where those orders are executed or those acts result in levying war; for this presence results directly from the military authority he holds and exercises. This authority is just as effectual in one place within his department as in another. The doctrine of legal presence was devised for the purpose of testing and making out the guilt of a traitor, not to screen him. It was for the great purpose of protecting society and Government from tumult, anarchy, and violence, not "to screen the guilty and to varnish crime." It was devised as a plain, practical rule of common sense by which courts were to hold the man guilty who was really so; not to enable the powerful, the cunning, and the wary to "entangle justice in the net of law," and escape her falling ax by the dexterous maneuver of darting from one place to another.

I cannot resist the conclusion that Davis may be legally tried in any judicial district where hostilities have taken place; and that each of his subordinate generals may in like manner be tried for all the acts of their respective commands committed in their respective departments. I see no difficulty in applying the ordinary doctrine of legal presence to all these cases. But upon the doctrine of the Attorney General I foresee no prosecutions for treason. I foresee that justice will be cheated of her due, of victims whose lives have been a thousand times forfeited to their country by the crimes they have committed against her laws, and all other laws, human and divine; offenders whose condign punishment for treason against that country is demanded by the outraged feelings of every true man in the land, by the dying groans of the myriads of the loyal who have fallen, by the cries of the widows and orphans left to mourn and to suffer, by the dignity of this nation as one of the family of nations, and by the voice of eternal justice, without whose favor neither a nation nor an individual can prosper. It is true the war has ceased to drench the earth with blood; the rebels have laid down their arms; they are conquered, but with a supercilious sneer at their conquerors, kindly and condescendingly assure them that they "accept the situation," that southern independence is a failure, and that they are willing and ready again to be represented in Congress; but we all know that at heart they hate and detest the Government they betrayed four years ago, and which now holds them in the iron grip of conquest. They hate it, and hate the loyal people who uphold it, for the same reason that any criminal who has sought the life of an innocent man hates the man who has brought him to justice. They hate it because their failure to shake off its authority has deeply stung their pride and brought a total eclipse upon their vainglory and their vanity; because, seeing among themselves the desolation of war, and the poverty, starvation, and beggary it has brought to their own doors, they recognize in these the lasting, the unanswerable evidences of their own folly, weakness, and madness. And as they gaze upon the picture their hearts derive comfort only from a closer attachment to the lost cause and to the leaders and demi-gods they have so long worshipped.

It is, sir, utterly vain to think of obtaining a conviction of those leaders at the hands of a jury made up of such materials. They would be far more likely to bring in a verdict of guilty against the judge on the bench, the President of the United States, or some of the heads of Department. At any rate I regard it as wholly out of the question to try and convict Davis or any other rebel leader of the crime of treason in any rebel State, for the plain reason that no impartial jury can be there found to try him. The doctrine of the Attorney General, if it shall be adhered to, practically defeats it; defeats the just expectations of the country, and sets aside all that the President has said about making treason odious. I predict, sir, that no such conviction, no such trial, will ever be had. Treason will not thus be made odious, but will go without day.

The President, in his message at the opening of the session, very patriotically remarks that persons who are charged with the commission of treason should have a fair and impartial trial in the highest tribunals of the country, in order that the Constitution and laws may be fully vindicated, the truth clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime, that traitors should be punished, and the offense made infamous. But how can this be done upon the principles of law held by the Attorney General? However well intended by the President, this declaration must remain without any practical value whatever so long as it is hampered and loaded down by official construction of the Constitution which renders it useless—a construction which has never received the sanction of the Supreme Court, nor fully of any circuit court of the United States, because the question has never been fully and fairly presented to them.

No, sir, this style of showing that treason is a crime, and making it infamous, is a mere delusion. It is recommending to be done that which will not be done, and cannot be done under the doctrines now prevailing in the office of the Attorney General; and it only remains for the President to do what is recommended by the resolution under consideration, and put Davis and his fellow-prisoners on trial before a court, and for a crime as to which he at least needs no professional advice at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 61 is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. If there be no objection—I presume there will not be—I should like to have a vote taken on this resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer that it should go over. I wish to make some remarks on the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for the order of the day.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL, to insert after the word "that" in the third line of the first section the words:

All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color, and.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter upon any general discussion of the character of this bill or the measure at large. It has been denominated by the honorable Senator who reported it to the Senate [Mr. TRUMBULL] as an important measure, and it has been so characterized by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS] and it undoubtedly in its general scope and bearing is of the highest importance. But I purpose to address myself, in the brief moments that I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate, to the amendment simply and alone. This amendment is important or unimportant as we understand the principles of public law applicable to the general subject. It is important as a declaration of American law I concede. It is important moreover as a definition.

If there is anything with which the American people are troubled, and if there is anything with which the American statesman is perplexed and vexed, it is what to do with the negro, how to define him, what he is in American law, and to what rights he is entitled. What shall we do with the everlasting, inevitable negro? is the question which puzzles all brains and vexes all statesmanship. Now, as a definition, this amendment settles it. Hitherto we have said that he was a nondescript in our statutes; he had no status; he was ubiquitous; he was both man and thing; he was three fifths of a person for representation and he was a thing for commerce and for use. In the highest sense, then, in which any definition can ever be held, this bill is important as a definition. It defines him to be a man and only a man in American politics and in American law; it puts him on the plane of manhood; it brings him within the pale of the Constitution. That is all it does as a definition, and there it leaves him.

But, sir, as a question of law I do not attach any very great importance to the declaration. It is not an enactment in the sense of the law, and the honorable chairman so understands it. He understands that it is an affirmative proposition. It affirms the high principles of American law, and that only. Therefore, it is not an enactment in the sense of the law, in the sense of legislation, but a declaration of a grand, fundamental principle of law and politics, and as such I hail it; as such it has a transcendent importance; as such it is without a parallel in the history of the legislation of this country or perhaps of any other.

As matter of law, does anybody deny here or anywhere that the native born is a citizen, and a citizen by virtue of his birth alone? The honorable Senator from Kentucky has vexed himself somewhat I think with the problem of the naturalization of American citizens. As he reads it, only foreigners can be naturalized, or, in other words, can become citizens; and upon his assumption, four million men and women in this country are outside not only of naturalization, not only of citizenship, but outside of the possibility of citizenship. Sir, he has forgotten the grand principle both of nature and nations, both of law and politics, that birth gives citizenship of itself. This is the fundamental principle running through all modern politics both in this country and in Europe. Everywhere where the principles of law have been recognized at all, birth by its inherent energy and force gives citizenship. Therefore the founders of this Government made no provision—of course they made none—for the naturalization of natural-born citizens. The Constitution speaks of "natural born," and speaks of them as citizens in contradistinction from those who are alien to us. Therefore, sir, this amendment, although it is a grand enunciation, although it is a lofty and sublime declaration, has no force or efficiency as an enactment. I hail it and accept it simply as a declaration.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky, when he criticises the methods of naturalization, and rules out, for want of power, four million people, forgets this general process of nations and of nature by which every man, by his birth, is entitled to citizenship, and that upon the general principle that he owes allegiance to the country of his birth, and that country owes him protection. That is the foundation, as I understand it, of all citizenship, and these are the essential elements of citizenship; allegiance on the one side and protection on the other.

But, sir, this amendment to which I address myself is important in another respect. It marks an epoch in the history of this country, and from this time forward the legislation takes a fresh and a new departure. Sir, to-day is the only hour since this Government began when it was possible to have enacted it. Such has been the situation of politics in this country, nay, sir, such have been the provisions of the fundamental law of this country, that such legislation, hitherto, has never been possible. There has been no time since the foundation of the Government when an American Congress could by possibility have enacted such a law, or with propriety have made such a declaration. What is this declaration? All persons born in this country are citizens. That never was so before. Although I have said that by the fundamental principles of American law all persons were entitled to be citizens by birth, we all know that there was an exceptional condition in the government of the country which provided for an exception to this general rule. Here were four million slaves in this country that were not citizens, not citizens by the general policy of the country, not citizens on account of their condition of servitude; up to this hour they could not have been treated by us as citizens; so long as that provision in the Constitution which recognized this exceptional condition remained the fundamental law of the country, such a declaration as this would not have been legal, could not have been enacted by Congress. I hail it, therefore, as a declaration which typifies a grand fundamental change in the politics of the country, and which change justifies the declaration now.

The Senator from Kentucky denounces as a usurpation this measure, and particularly this amendment, this declaration. He says it is not within the principles of the Constitution. That it is extraordinary I admit. That the measure is not ordinary is most clear. There is no parallel, I have already said, for it in the history of this country; there is no parallel for it in the history of any country. No nation from the foundation of government has ever undertaken to make a legislative declaration so broad. Why? Because no nation hitherto has ever cherished a liberty so universal. The ancient republics were all exceptional in their liberty; they all had excepted classes, subjected classes, which were not the subject of government; and therefore they could not so legislate. That it is extraordinary and without a parallel in the history of this Government or of any other does not affect the character of the declaration itself.

The Senator from Kentucky tells us that the proposition is revolutionary, and he thinks that is an objection. I freely concede that it is revolutionary. I admit that this species of legislation is absolutely revolutionary. But are we not in the midst of revolution? Is the Senator from Kentucky utterly oblivious to the grand results of four years of war? Are we not in the midst of a civil and political revolution which has changed the fundamental principles of our Government in some respects? Sir, is it no revolution that you have changed the entire system of servitude in this country? Is it no revolution that now you can no longer talk of two systems of civilization in this country? Four short years back I remember to have listened to eloquent speeches in this Chamber, in which we were told that there was a grand antagonism in our institutions; that there were two civilizations; that there was a civilization based on servitude, and that it was antagonistic to the free institutions of the country. Where is that? Gone forever. That result is a revolution grander and sublimer in its consequences than the world has witnessed hitherto.

I accept, then, what the Senator from Kentucky thinks so obnoxious. We are in the midst of revolution. We have revolutionized this Constitution of ours to that extent; and every substantial change in the fundamental constitution of a country is a revolution. Why, sir, the Constitution even provides for revolutionizing itself. Nay, more, it contemplates it; contemplates that in the changing phases of life, civil and political, changes in the fundamental law will become necessary; and is it needful for me to advert to the facts and events of the last four or five years to justify the declaration that revolution here is not only radical and thorough, but the result of the events of the last four years? Of course I mean to contend in all I say that the revolution of which I speak should be peaceful, as on the part of the Government here it has been peaceful. It grows out, to be sure, of an assault upon our institutions by those whose purpose it was to overthrow the Government; but on the part of the Government it has been peaceful, it has been within the forms of the Constitution; but it is a revolution nevertheless.

But the honorable Senator from Kentucky insists that it is a usurpation. Not so, sir. Although it is a revolution radical, as I contend, it was not a usurpation. It was not a usurpation, because it took place within the provisions contemplated in the Constitution. More than that, it was a change precisely in harmony with the general principles of the Government. This great change which has been wrought in our institutions was in harmony with the fundamental principles of the Government. The change which has been made has destroyed that which was exceptional in our institutions; and the action of the Government in regard to it was provoked by the enemies of the Government. The opportunity was afforded, and the change which has been wrought was in harmony with the fundamental principles of the Government.

But, Mr. President, it is said that this amendment raises the general question of the antagonism of the races, which we are told is a well-established fact. It is said that no rational man, no intelligent legislator or statesman should ever act without reference to that grand historical fact; and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] on a former occasion asserted that this Government, that American society, had been established here upon the principle of the exclusion, as he termed it, of the inferior and the barbarian races. Mr. President, I deny that proposition as a historical fact. There is nothing more inaccurate. No proposition could possibly be made here or anywhere else more inaccurate than to say that American society, either civil or political, was formed in the interest of any race or class. Sir, the history of the country does not bear out the statement of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. Was not America said to be the land of refuge? Has it not been since the earliest period held up as an asylum for the oppressed of all nations? Hither, allow me to ask, have not all the peoples of the nations of the earth come for an asylum and for refuge? All the nations of the earth and all the varieties of the races of the nations of the earth have gathered here. In the early settlements of the country, the Irish, the French, the Swede, the Turk, the Italian, the Moor, and so I might enumerate all the races and all the variety of races, came here, and it is a fundamental mistake to suppose that settlement was begun here in the interests of any class or condition or race or interest. This western continent was looked to as an asylum for the oppressed of all nations and of all races. Higher all nations and all races have come. Here, sir, upon the grand plane of republican democratic liberty, they have undertaken to work out the great problem of man's capacity for self-government without stint or limit.

Then the honorable Senator advances one step further, and contends that not only was society formed in the interests of a race—the superior race as he is pleased to call it—but that Government here was organized in the interest of a race. I deny it utterly. I deny that Government was organized in the interest of any race or color, and there is neither "race" nor "color" in our history politically or civilly—not a bit of it. Is there any "color" or "race" in the Declaration of Independence, allow me to ask? "All men are created equal" excludes the idea of race or color or caste. There never was in the history of this country any other distinction than that of condition, and it was all founded on condition.

We have been told, Mr. President, that this question of race was clearly recognized and settled in a case that was before the Supreme Court some years ago—the Dred Scott case so called. I will read from that case. I read first from the syllabus of it: "A free negro of the African race, whose ancestors were brought to this country and sold as slaves, is not a 'citizen' within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States," not on account of his race or on account of his color, but on account of his condition. The point of the decision is that an African who was brought into this country and sold as a slave was not an American citizen. The Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, after quoting the language of the Declaration of Independence, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal," &c., proceeds to say:

"The general words above quoted would seem to embrace the whole human family, and if they were used in a similar instrument at this day would be so understood. But it is too clear for dispute that the enslaved African race were not intended to be included."

Not the colored man, not the African as a race, but "the enslaved African race," he says, "were not intended to be included, and formed no part of the people who framed and adopted this Declaration." On what ground? Simply, I repeat, on the ground of their condition, because they were not in a condition to take part in the Government of the country. Further on the same idea is repeated in this language:

"No one of that race had ever migrated to the United States voluntarily; all of them had been brought here as articles of merchandise. The number that had been emancipated at that time were but few in comparison with those held in slavery; and they were identified in the public mind with the race to which they belonged, and regarded as a part of the slave population rather than the free."

Further on the same sentiment is repeated again:

"Indeed, when we look to the condition of this race in the several States at the time, it is impossible to believe that these rights and privileges were intended to be extended to them."

Why? On account of their condition, not on account of their race.

Mr. President, although to repeat what I said in the beginning, I attach no importance to the declaration of this amendment as a matter of law, as a matter of enactment, giving legislative force or legislative sanction to this bill, I do hail it as the grandest declaration in all time as a legislative act, and I congratulate the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that it has fallen to his good fortune to be the instrument for the introduction of such a declaration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DOOLITTLE in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from California yesterday made some objections to regarding as citizens of the United States Indians who owed no allegiance whatever to their tribes, who were not connected with the tribes. I should like very much to hear the reason of the objection. The State, as I understand, can exclude them from the ballot-box just as well after we declare them to be citizens of the United States as it could before. The State will not be compelled thereby to admit them to the ballot-box. What objection can the Senators have to declaring Indians living in the country, although they may not be taxed, to be citizens of the United States?

Mr. RAMSEY. Our objection has been overcome by the modification of the amendment. The objection was addressed to the amendment as it then stood, but that amendment has now been modified.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will understand me as objecting to the amendment as it now stands. An individual of the Caucasian race, whether he pays a tax in a State or not, is undoubtedly regarded as a citizen of the United States. Why make it obligatory upon the Indian, owing no allegiance to any tribal authority, to pay a tax before he can be regarded as a citizen of the United States? As the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] very properly remarked, the United States citizenship in that case is dependent upon nothing except the possession of property upon which a tax is actually paid. I suppose that according to the rule adopted in the amendment, a State ought to be permitted to exclude any white man from taxation, and by so doing to deny him the rights of citizenship. Why not?

My point is that the Indian, if he is connected with no tribe, whether he is taxed or not, ought to be a citizen of the United States. What harm can there be in declaring that fact? What injury can it do? I ask the Senator from Minnesota. The State need not admit him to the franchise. He may be a citizen of the United States, and yet not have all the privileges and all the immunities of a citizen of the State in which he may be. The State may deny him any of them that it chooses to deny. But why not declare him a citizen of the United States? What harm can there be in that? It will enable him to sue in the courts of the United States to enforce his rights there, and I cannot see for my part what else it will do. As the Constitution now stands, of course the State cannot be injured in any of its reserved powers.

It can certainly do none of the States any harm to declare that the Indian himself, owing no allegiance to any tribe, and thereby not falling within the exception of the amendment as owing allegiance quasi to a foreign Power, (regarding the Indian tribes as foreign Powers,) separated from the tribe, shall be regarded as a citizen of the United States. I have heard no reason yet, and I desire to hear it if there be any. I am opposed to the amendment as it now stands, for the reason that it does make an exception. Now that we are fixing the law on the subject, why not declare every man born in the United States to be a citizen of the United States, irrespective of race or previous condition? Is there any objection to it?

You may declare him a citizen of the United States without doing any harm, as I before stated, and why not do it? Why not make the rule general? You propose to declare that all the negroes are citizens. I say that is perfectly right, though I do not deem it necessary so to declare by this amendment, because I think that is the case already. I do not choose, however, to enter into any argument on that point. I hold that every man born within the United States, and who has been liberated by the constitutional amendment, is a citizen of the United States. I shall not now go into an argument in regard to the powers of the States, to consider whether the States may not deny all the privileges and rights of State citizenship to the negro. I am speaking only of this privilege of each individual, as I hold, to be a citizen of the United States; and I can see no reason operating against the Indian. The negro of Georgia to-day, whether he pays a tax or not, is declared to be a citizen of the United States. Why not? He may pay no tax to the State of Georgia; but should that fact deprive him of the privilege of being a citizen of the United States? Was he not born here? Does he owe any allegiance to a foreign Power? Is he not bound to bear arms in defense of his country? Certainly he is. Cannot the State of California or Minnesota, where the Indian is living among the whites, owing no tribal allegiance, compel him to bear arms in defense of the State and the United States? Unquestionably so. Why not, then, make him a citizen of the United States?

Shall Georgia, or Florida, or Virginia; or any other State, have the power to say, ought it be allowed to say, "We will not tax the negroes, and thereby nullify the declaration of the United States Congress that they are citizens of the United States?" If the mere fact of paying a tax in the respective States shall confer citizenship, why not make that applicable to the negro as well as the Indian? Is there any reason for the discrimination? Why discriminate when laying down a great and broad principle? Why not make it general and universal? There is no reason in the world why it should not be so. We give these Indians in the States no rights that the States may choose to deny to them by simply declaring the universal fact. Let us make it universal.

The original proposition of the Senator from Illinois was correct. What do you mean by "Indians not taxed"? Do you mean not taxed by State authority, or not taxed by Federal authority? If one of these Indians in Minnesota owns property, whether the State taxes him or not, are you not going to tax him by Federal authority? If he executes an instrument there, must he not procure a revenue stamp and use it just as anybody else? If he has an income, does not the United States assessor assess the income of that Indian in Minnesota just exactly as he assesses the income of the white man? Why then not give him the rights of United States citizenship if he is not connected with a tribe and thereby quasi a foreigner owing allegiance to a quasi foreign Power? I do not understand that this discrimination can be rightfully or properly made, and therefore I am opposed to it unless I can hear some better reason given for it than I have heard heretofore. I do not see any good reason for it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say a single word on this subject by way of reply to my friend from Missouri. From time immemorial, indeed in the Constitution itself, this very distinction between Indians taxed and Indians not taxed has been a fundamental distinction. In the enumeration of the people of the United States who are made the basis of representation and taxation, Indians not taxed were expressly excluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. So were negroes excluded.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Two fifths were excluded and three fifths were counted; but that referred undoubtedly to Africans in a state of slavery.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am talking about citizenship. Slaves were not then citizens at all; now they are.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Indians not taxed were excluded because they were not regarded as a portion of the population of the United States. They are subject to the tribes to which they belong, and those tribes are always spoken of in the Constitution as if they were independent nations, to some extent, existing in our midst but not constituting a part of our population, and with whom we make treaties.

There is another reason why the Indians not taxed ought not to be included in this grant of citizenship. If you make them citizens, of course they will not only have the privileges of citizens, but they will be subjected to the duties of citizens. They will not only have the right to sue, but they will be liable to be sued. They will not only have the right to make contracts, but they will be bound by their contracts; and that is a policy which the Government has resisted from the beginning in its dealings with the Indians, except with those Indians who have become citizens and are liable to be taxed. Then they are regarded as citizens of the United States. Without going into the argument at length, I am decidedly of the opinion that if by declaring the Indians to be citizens you are going to bind them by their contracts and permit them to be sued as other citizens are in the courts of the United States, the Indians are not yet prepared for citizenship.

Another answer to my friend is, that so far as relates to the Indian population they can be provided for specially by other acts of Congress when the question shall arise. It is not necessary to provide for it in this bill, for if you do, it will give rise to difficulty. If you undertake to provide in this proposition that every Indian born in the United States who may not be for the time being incorporated in any tribe shall be a citizen of the United States you may compel some of us to vote against the amendment altogether. Although some of these Indians may be disconnected from their tribes; and may be wandering in bands and in families, as there are some in the State of Wisconsin and in other States, I do not think they are yet in a condition to be incorporated as part of the citizens of the United States and made liable to be bound by the contracts which they may make and to be sued upon their contracts.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Missouri seems to base his position upon the mistaken theory that all Indians who are no longer connected with their tribes or under a tribal government are civilized Indians, living as farmers, or in some other way earning a livelihood in the white settlements. That is an entire mistake. Where that happens to be the case, they are probably civilized Indians, holding property, and taxed in that way. But in all the border States there are large numbers of wild, savage Indians, as uncivilized and as untamed as any on the plains, who have no tribal government, who are outlaws from their tribes and their nations. It certainly is not the intention of the Senator or the intention of the Senate to admit Indians of that class to citizenship. It has been the policy of the Government from its foundation not to consider them as citizens. There are large numbers of Indians who acknowledge no tribal government at all, who have no connection with any tribes, and who, unless some modification of this amendment is made, would be admitted to citizenship under it, which certainly cannot be the intention of the Senate or the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Missouri assumes that there is a sort of property qualification to citizenship. Such is not the meaning of the provision. The Senator from Missouri and myself desire to arrive at the same point precisely, and that is to make citizens of everybody born in the United States who owe allegiance to the United States. We cannot make a citizen of the child of a foreign minister who is temporarily residing here. There is a difficulty in framing the amendment so as to make citizens of all the people born in the United States and who owe allegiance to it. I thought that might perhaps be the best form in which to put the amendment at one time, "That all persons born in the United States and owing allegiance thereto are hereby declared to be citizens;" but upon investigation it was found that a sort of allegiance was due to the country from persons temporarily resident in it whom we would have no right to make citizens, and that that form would not answer.

Then it was suggested that we should make citizens of all persons born in the United States not subject to any foreign Power or tribal authority. The objection to that was, that there were Indians not subject to tribal authority who yet were wild and untamed in their habits, who had by some means or other become separated from their tribes and were not under the laws of any civilized community, and of whom the authorities of the United States took no jurisdiction. The Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] told us that there were in his State Indians who had been placed upon reservations under charge of Indian superintendents who had been separated from their tribes and were not under any tribal authority, but they were there under the regulations of treaties which had been made with them, and were supplied and looked after by our Indian agents the same as other Indians who were perfectly wild, not submitting at all to the usages of civilized life, and it could not be intended to make that class of persons citizens.

Then it was proposed to adopt the amendment as it now stands, that all persons born in the United States not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, shall be citizens. What does that phrase "excluding Indians not taxed" mean? The Senator from Missouri understands it to be a property qualification to become a citizen. Not at all. It is a constitutional term used by the men who made the Constitution itself to designate, what? To designate a class of persons who were not a part of our population. That is what it means. They are not counted in the census. They are not regarded as a part of our people. The term "Indians not taxed" means Indians not counted in our enumeration of the people of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Considered virtually as foreigners.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Considered virtually as foreigners, as a description of persons connected with those tribes with whom we make treaties. That is what the phrase means. Whenever they are separated from those tribes, and come within the jurisdiction of the United States so as to be counted, they are citizens of the United States. It is not intended as a property qualification. That is not the meaning of it. The Senator wants to know why, if an Indian cannot be a citizen without being taxed, should a white man or a negro be a citizen without being taxed. If the negro or white man belonged to a foreign Government he would not be a citizen; we do not propose that he should be; and that is all that the words "Indians not taxed," in that connection, mean.

Mr. HENDERSON. "Not taxed" by whom? By Federal authority or by State authority?

Mr. TRUMBULL. By anybody. The term here is meant to embrace those persons who yet belong to the Indian tribes, foreign Governments. "Indians not taxed" is a term used to designate those Indians yet belonging to a foreign Government, and not counted as a part of our people.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator would certainly accomplish that object by his original amendment, to insert the words "not owing allegiance to any tribe." I barely throw out these suggestions for the consideration of the Senate. I certainly am offering no opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, because I shall vote for the very broadest proposition on this subject. The Senator from Wisconsin answered me that if we declared these Indians to be citizens of the United States they would be permitted to make contracts, if I understood him properly, and that was the objection he had to it. Why, sir, I suppose that any State, even after we declared the Indians to be citizens of the United States, would have a perfect right, if it saw fit, if it thought they were savages or barbarians or anything of that character, to deny them the right to make contracts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask the Senator from Maryland, who seems to dissent from the proposition, if the minor, born of white parents, eighteen or nineteen years of age, is not a citizen of the United States? Can he make a contract under State laws? Then will the Senator tell me why a State cannot deny to an Indian after he has been declared to be a citizen of the United States the right to make a contract?

Mr. GRIMES. Can a State deny to an Indian the right to contract or to sue when we make him a citizen by this bill with all the rights of a citizen under the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose he would take those rights in deference to the laws of the respective States. You must look to them. Our Government, as I understand it, is a complex piece of machinery. There are certain powers granted to the Federal Government, and those we can exercise here; all others are reserved to the States; and I do not understand that by declaring a man to be a citizen of the United States we thereby take away the right of a State to declare whether he is competent to make a contract or not. The lunatic is not authorized to make a contract by State law, certainly not by Federal law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator what rights, then, are conferred upon the Indian by declaring him to be a citizen in this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. When I started the proposition here, I did not think it would involve me in the difficulty of explaining all the rights that belong to an American citizen, and certainly it would be a difficult matter for me to do it now, without having examined the subject. I ask the Senator from Minnesota and these other Senators who are objecting to it, what rights would be granted by a declaration of this sort that would interfere with the authority of their respective States which they desire to retain? I do not choose now to define, and I frankly say to the Senator from Oregon that I might commit some blunders if I were to undertake to define the rights of an American citizen. I do not choose to enter into that subject. I only ask the Senators to tell me what difficulties their respective States would have to meet in prescribing such rules and regulations for the government of that population as they might see fit. I have not heard a single word on their part to indicate to me that there is any objection to it. I prefer the original amendment as offered by the Senator from Illinois, that all persons born on the soil of the United States shall be citizens except those who owe allegiance to some foreign Power at the time, or are connected with tribes of Indians. I think that that is the proper rule; I can see no objection to it; but I do not wish to throw anything in the way of the bill.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The proposition as it now stands before the Senate does not reach the object that I intended, and as I perceive that it will embarrass the bill in its present shape, especially in the House of Representatives, I suggest to the Senator from Illinois whether it would not be better to strike out that provision in reference to the Indians not taxed. It does not reach the object that I desire to reach. The Indians holding their lands in severalty by allotment are not taxed. Those are the Indians that I desire to reach; and I propose, at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Massachusetts, to introduce a separate bill giving to those Indians holding their lands in severalty by allotment in Kansas the power to sell their timber and their lands. I am extremely anxious to have this bill passed, and passed as soon as possible. I suggest, therefore, whether it would not be better to strike out that portion of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Illinois one question in reference to this proposed amendment. What effect will it have upon the original section? Does it enlarge the powers and rights conferred and enumerated in that section, or does it restrict them? If it enlarges them, how and to what extent? If it restricts them, in what respect? May it not be that this proposed amendment will produce no practical good, while it will excite prejudice and hostility to the bill? The proposed amendment undertakes to declare that certain persons shall be citizens, excluding another class of persons; but the original bill provides that all the inhabitants of every State and Territory in the United States shall possess certain rights, which are enumerated in the section, and comprehend, as it seems to me, all the civil rights that belong to a citizen. Now, if a bill is passed by Congress conferring upon all the inhabitants of every State and Territory all the civil rights that belong to a citizen, what necessity is there for declaring that a certain class of persons shall be citizens, excluding another class? I simply desire to know whether this proposed amendment is to change the meaning and effect of the original bill or not; and if it is to change it, I desire to know in what respect it will accomplish that change; and then I can vote understandingly upon the amendment.

I wish to say one word upon the remarks submitted by the Senator from Missouri, as also upon the remark submitted by the Senator from Kansas. There are Indians in the States and Territories of the United States outside of Kansas. There are thousands of Indians in the State of Oregon. They are generally collected upon reservations. Some of these Indians are there by virtue of treaties; some are there in consequence of the Indian wars that have occurred from time to time in that country; and they are there, and held there by compulsion. The Government of the United States feeds, clothes, and takes care of these Indians, treats them as wards, treats them as incapable of self-government; and they are governed by such rules and regulations as are prescribed by the Government from time to time, and as the necessities of the case seem to require.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask him if he is not in favor of now making all the negroes in the southern States citizens of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. He is now objecting to making the Indians citizens on the ground that the Government of the United States is taking care of them. Let me ask the Senator if we have not just passed a bill enlarging the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau and declaring those negroes incompetent to make contracts, and putting their contracts under the superintendence of the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, whom we have sent down into the southern States, or will send down there under that bill, to superintend their contracts? Have we not also provided that the Secretary of War shall issue provisions, subsistence, clothing, &c., for the use of those negroes? Have we not put all their contracts under the supervision of this Freedmen's Bureau? If the objection of the Senator on that score is good as against the Indians, it is certainly good as against the negroes and the poor whites of the southern States who are reduced to poverty to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am simply describing the condition of these Indians. I understand the honorable Senator to be in favor of making a distinction between one class of Indians and another class of Indians in the United States. He does not pretend to say that Congress ought to declare all the wild and savage Indians of the United States citizens of the United States, but he proposes to make a distinction between one class of Indians and another class of Indians by declaring that those under tribal authority shall not be citizens, and those that are not under tribal authority shall be citizens. I insist that the proposed amendment is more convenient and more certain than the plan advocated by the Senator. Thousands of these Indians in the State that I have the honor to represent are collected upon reservations; they are not subject to tribal authority; their tribes are broken up and destroyed; they consist of the fragments and remnants of tribes gathered together upon these reservations; but they are no more competent or qualified to vote than they were when they existed as original tribes.

Mr. HENDERSON. We do not make them voters.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are to be made citizens, and I say they are no more qualified to become citizens than when they existed as original tribes. I do not exactly understand what the Senator means when he insists that Congress shall make them citizens and does not claim that any right attaches to that character.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him, if citizenship be conferred upon the Indian, what right will be conferred that he objects to? The Indian, like the negro, was born upon our soil, and I say let him be declared a citizen also, unless some right will be thereby conferred upon him that will conflict with the general interests of the States. Will the Senator tell me what interest will be conflicted with, what power of the State to take care of the Indians will be denied by this legislation? I am seeking light on this subject, and if the Senator can answer that question satisfactorily, I shall withdraw all objection to the amendment as it stands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Much of the legislation of a State proceeds upon the assumption that certain persons have rights as citizens. They are described in the legislation of the States as citizens, and the Constitution of the United States describes certain persons as citizens of the United States. The Constitution of the United States provides that no person but a native-born citizen of the United States, with other qualifications as to age and residence, shall be President of the United States; that no person not possessing the qualifications prescribed in it shall be a Senator or Representative. If this bill makes these persons citizens within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, I ask if they do not become eligible to these different offices? Is not any man in the United States, who is a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution, eligible to the office of President or Senator or Representative? Is the Congress of the United States prepared at this time to adopt a proposition that negroes and Indians and Chinese and all persons of that description shall be eligible to the office of President of the United States, Senator, or Representative in Congress, before they are allowed to vote? I might refer, I think, to other instances to show that rights might follow if these persons are declared to be citizens of the United States.

Now, sir, in the State of Oregon it has been found necessary to pass laws regulating the intercourse between the Indians and white persons. The Indians are put under certain disabilities, and it is supposed that those disabilities are necessary in order to protect the peace and safety of the community. As an illustration, it is made an indictable offense in the State of Oregon for any white man to sell arms or ammunition to any Indians. Suppose these Indians have equal rights with white men in that State. Then if a man is indicted for selling arms and ammunition to an Indian, may he not defend that prosecution successfully upon the ground that Congress has declared that an Indian is a citizen, and has the same right to buy and hold any kind of property that a white man of the State has? In that way, the white people of that State would be deprived of the power of protecting themselves, or of enacting such laws as they might deem necessary for their own protection.

I might refer to another law in reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the State to Indians. A white man has the legal right in the State of Oregon to buy a gallon or a barrel of whisky; but the law forbids white men selling whisky to Indians, because it endangers the peace and safety of the community. But if Congress declares that Indians in the State of Oregon shall have the same right to buy and hold all kinds of property that white men have, then, it seems to me, if a man is indicted in that State for selling liquor to Indians, by which he puts the lives of the white people in peril, he may defend himself upon the ground that Congress has declared that an Indian has as much right to buy, sell, and use that kind of property as a white man has.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator if the law of Oregon now does not forbid the selling of intoxicating liquors to minors under twenty-one years of age, under a penalty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not. There is no such law in that State to my knowledge.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is the law in my State, and perhaps in almost every State in the Union, and the power to pass such a law has never been denied to the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Minors, the sons of white men, are not savage Indians. Liquor may perhaps be sold with safety to the sons of white men, while to sell a quart of liquor to an Indian may imperil the lives of the people in a whole neighborhood; but there is no such law as that in the State of Oregon.

I insist, Mr. President, that if this proposed amendment is to be adopted by the Senate, it is in the best form in which it can be put at this time, and that the distinction which is made in it is the most convenient and certain one that can be adopted. The object is not to make taxation a criterion or a test of citizenship; but, although it is not absolutely certain, and may operate with hardship, perhaps, in individual cases, it is the most certain way of defining the distinction between wild, savage, and untamed Indians, and those who associate with white people, own property, and exercise the privileges that generally attend a citizen in the community. I do not see that anything is to be gained by changing the amendment in that respect, and I hope, if it be adopted at all, it will be adopted in its present shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DOOLITTLE.) The question before the Senate is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the honorable chairman of the committee—certainly not with a view to defeat his proposition, but with a view of making it to me more acceptable—whether it is not advisable to strike out the latter part of the amendment. The amendment as it stands is that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to a foreign Power, shall, by virtue of birth, be citizens. To that I am willing to consent; and that comprehends all persons, without any reference to race or color, who may be so born. That being so, why is it necessary to add to the amendment the words "without distinction of color?" I think it very advisable that all questions of that sort, all questions involving the rights which may be supposed to exist in one race and not to exist in the other, should be done away with as soon as possible; and the striking out of the words to which I have alluded, the latter words of the amendment, will leave the amendment just as operative as it will be if the words are retained. I should hope the honorable member and the Senate would have no objection to striking out those words. If the Chair will permit me, I will ask to have the amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment, to insert after the word "that," in the third line of the first section, the words:

All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color, and,

Mr. JOHNSON. Strike out the latter words, "without distinction of color," and it would be very clear that everybody born in the United States would be a citizen, and, unless it be true—and I, certainly, am not the person to admit that it is true for a moment—that a black man is not a person, all black persons born in the United States, who are not subject to any foreign Power, would become citizens by virtue of birth.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I agree with the object which the Senator from Maryland has in view, and, in my opinion, it would not make any difference if those words, "without distinction of color," were stricken out; but it is desirable to make the bill specific and to have no misunderstanding about it. It is contended and gravely argued here in the Senate that this is a white man's Government, made by white men, and for white men, and that the negro is not included in the Government. The Declaration of Independence declares that "all men are created equal." I suppose that means the colored man as much as the white man.

Mr. JOHNSON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maryland thinks it does. It declares also that "they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to maintain these ends Governments are instituted among men." I think that declaration, that "all men are created equal," applied as much to the black as to the white man; but the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] will not admit that. I think it is best, therefore, when we are enacting a statute on this subject declaratory of what the law is, (for that is all this bill amounts to,) to put it beyond question.

The Senator from Oregon asked if these persons were not citizens without this declaration. In my judgment they are; in my judgment, persons born in the United States and owing no allegiance to any foreign Power are citizens without regard to color; but it is desirable to place this matter beyond question, and therefore we are passing a law declaratory of what, in my judgment, the law now is, in order to remove any doubts that anybody may have about it; and for that reason I think it better to retain the words without "distinction of color," that there may be no dispute that the word "persons" means everybody. If the Declaration had said, "all men are created equal without distinction of color," it seems to me it would not have been possible even for the Senator from Kentucky to contend that negroes were not embraced; but he does now so contend. Therefore, I think we had better retain the words "without distinction of color."

Various suggestions in regard to amendments have been made to which I, individually, would have no objection, but I see that the moment we yield to an amendment in order to satisfy one member of the Senate, we get into a difficulty with some other member. We have that difficulty now in regard to the Indians. I wish this whole Indian question was out of the way. It is not the great object of the bill. I was satisfied with the proposition as we first had it; but in order to remove the objections of others we have changed its phraseology until now it stands in the form in which it has just been read from the desk; and that, upon the whole, I think, is the best form in which we can put it, and I trust the Senate will adhere to it as it is.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Illinois, certainly, does not understand me as opposed to his amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I suggested was—and I submit that there is some degree of force in the objection—that it is very desirable that we should cease to consider for a moment that, in relation to citizenship and rights, there is, as far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, any difference on account of color. The honorable member admits that the omission of the words which I have suggested should be stricken out will leave the provision precisely the same. His objection to striking them out is, that there may be persons in the United States who will hold that the provision, if it is so changed, would not comprehend the negro. It is impossible to provide against every possible doubt that may be suggested by any one man or any dozen men in the United States. There are all sorts of notions, having no foundation in fact or in law, broached from time to time by individuals or classes of individuals; but I suppose that if the Constitution declared that all persons born in the United States should be citizens, nobody would be able to raise a reasonable doubt that it included the black man.

The idea to which the honorable Senator alluded, which has operated upon the mind of my friend from Kentucky, and operated upon the minds of the Supreme Court, as a reason why the general phraseology to be found in the declaration of rights was not comprehensive of the negro, was founded upon what was supposed to have been the condition of the United States at the time, with reference to the black race. They were all then slaves. In the judgment of many, being slaves, they were not persons within the meaning of the phrase used in the declaration of rights; and I am sure the honorable member will recollect that the Chief Justice, in giving the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case to which reference has been frequently made, concedes that if the words that are found in the Declaration of Independence were used now, or if at the time they were used there was no such thing as the slavery of Africans, and the same number of Africans had been in the United States, they would have been included within the general phraseology of persons entitled to certain inalienable rights; and I suppose no man in his senses could doubt that the use of those words would comprehend black as well as white, provided black as well as white were free men. It is idle to deny that a negro is not a man. It is idle to deny, therefore, that a negro is not a person. They are endowed certainly with some of the qualities of the white man. Whether they are endowed with all the intellectual capacity of the white man is a question about which differences of opinion have prevailed and may continue to prevail; but they have the same faculties, are subject to the same diseases, cured by the same medicines, endowed with the same affections. Nobody that knows the race can doubt that. Whether they are in all cases as keen in their affections as the white man may depend upon their cultivation, intellectually and morally; but that they are capable of a cultivation, intellectual and moral, that will make them regard the marriage relations just as absolutely and as affectionately as the white man, and regard their children with the same affection that the white man regards his children, I suppose nobody will doubt. Subject to the same complaints, cured by the same medicines, sustained by the same food, who could deny for a moment that the black man is a man and a human being; and if he be a man and a human being, who can doubt for a moment that he is a "person?"

I conclude, therefore, with what I said in the beginning, that it seems to me very desirable that we should upon the very first occasion that arises, and upon every occasion, if any future occasion should arise, say at once, virtually, by ceasing to use the term "distinction of color," that in the judgment of the American Senate and of the people of the United States there is no such distinction. If the Senator objects to the amendment that I suggest, I do not insist upon it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. While I dissent entirely from the construction which the Senator from Illinois puts upon the Declaration of Independence, I was pleased with one suggestion that he made, and that was, that in defining the right of citizenship there should be no room for doubt. The question that is before this Congress, and that must now go to the country, is that which was started by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] whether all persons living in this country are to be equal before the law without distinction of color. That is the question which he raised, and which we have now arrived at. I am perfectly content that that question shall go to the country. If the people agree to the proposition, I am content; if it is satisfactory to the white men of this country to admit into the political community Indians and other colored people, I shall no longer object; but I am gratified that the Senator from Illinois makes it in plain words, so that the issue shall be distinctly before the people.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask if it is in order to amend the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "not taxed" and inserting the words "not subject to tribal authority."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the way it was before.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would rather have it in that way; but I am not particular about it. I ask that the amendment may be read as I propose to amend it.

The SECRETARY. In the third line of the amendment it is proposed to strike out the words "not taxed" and to insert "not subject to tribal authority;" so that the amendment will read:

All persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not subject to tribal authority, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri, if he wishes to make that amendment, to insert those words right after the word

"Power;" so that it will read, "not subject to any foreign Power or tribal authority."

Mr. HENDERSON. I accept the modification. I think that is the best place to insert it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the original proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, we have got back to it now.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a general principle, and I prefer it in that form. I think while we are meeting this question we might as well meet it fairly and entirely. I cannot see any reason, nor have I heard a particle of reason given in the speeches that have been made, why this proposition should not be adopted.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Missouri has been told several times that there are in the border States large bodies of Indians not subject to tribal authority who are as wild and as untamed as any that roam over the plains. Would he make them citizens?

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that perfectly well; but will the Senator tell me how this declaration, that they are citizens of the United States, will interfere with the legislation of the State of Minnesota?

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Oregon has already explained that matter. There are many differences in State laws between these Indians and white men, and certainly you do not desire to confer on all these Indians the rights of citizenship; and yet you do that by this legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Oregon stated that if we declared them to be citizens of the United States, the State of Oregon perhaps could not forbid the sale of whisky to them, that the keeper of the dram-shop would be compelled to sell whisky to them the same as to other individuals. Why, sir, there is a law on the statute-book, I think, of every State in the Union, unless it be Oregon alone, that prohibits tavern-keepers and dram-shop keepers from selling liquor to minors. Are they not citizens of the United States? I think so, unquestionably; and why cannot the Legislature of Minnesota or of Oregon forbid the selling of whisky to Indians after the passage of this law? Certainly there can be no objection to their doing so. I think while we are declaring a general principle, we ought to meet the question boldly and fairly. There are but few Indians as I understand not subject to tribal authority in these different States, and surely it will not put the States or the people of the respective States where they are to the inconveniences that Senators suppose. The declaration of citizenship does not confer any right the exercise of which on their part cannot be restrained by a State Legislature so as to protect the general peace and welfare of the States. I am sure of that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As there is so much difficulty about this matter, and as it seems impossible to satisfy all gentlemen as to this phraseology, I think we had better stand by the constitutional phrase "excluding Indians not taxed." That means Indians not counted as a part of our population. It is not a property qualification at all. The people will not so understand it, and we do not so understand it. I hope the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri will not be adopted. Let us vote upon the proposition as we have it. I think it is in the best form in which we can place it.

Mr. HENDERSON. One word in reply. It used to be supposed that this Government was made exclusively for the white man, and it was so decided. We are deciding to-day that it was made for the white man and the black man, but that the red man shall have no interest in it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We are not deciding any such thing.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I assure the Senator from Missouri that as far as the State of Kansas is concerned, he is proposing to make citizens of the very lowest class of Indians, the vagrant Indians who have separated themselves from their tribal authority.

Mr. HENDERSON. What harm will that do?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I think it is unjust to the better class of Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Cragin, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Stockton, and Van Winkle—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Creswell, Dixon, Howe, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wright, and Yates—9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Subsequently (during the course of Mr. DAVIS's remarks, and by his permission) the following explanations were made:

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow me to record my vote on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. I was called out of the Chamber before the roll was called, and I ask the liberty of being allowed to record my name on the amendment. I vote "ay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, perhaps the Senator from Ohio will be permitted to record his vote.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think it can be done even by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed by several Senators that this has not been allowed in the Senate even by unanimous consent. I desire to say, therefore, that if I had been in my seat I would have voted "ay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I understand the rule is positively against it; that unanimous consent will not allow a vote to be recorded after the result has been announced.

Mr. CONNESS. Being absent temporarily I wish to make the same statement made by the Senator from Ohio, that I would have voted for the amendment if I had been present.

Mr. HOWE. If this is a time for defining our positions, I think I ought to take occasion to say that I would have voted the same way if I had been present.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I will state the various points which I made yesterday in the course of the desultory and running conversation between various Senators and myself, and shall then proceed to express my views in opposition to the bill. I hold:

1. Two centuries ago, and upward, the continent of North America was settled and taken possession of by the Governments and people of Europe, English, Irish, Scotch, French, Netherlands, Germans, Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Italians, Spanish, and Portuguese, all of the white race.

2. The negro, or any other race, had no ownership, proprietary power or government in their respective settlements—all was exclusively with the particular European nationality that had made the settlement.

3. All these settlements within the boundary of the original thirteen States had become, many years before the Declaration of Independence, possessions and colonies of the British empire, each one being a slaveholding community, and owning negroes of African birth and descent as property and chattels.

4. While all the colonies were thus slaveholding, the troubles between them and England began, to redress no wrongs or oppressions of the negroes, free or slave, in all or any of the colonies: but to redress the wrongs and oppressions of the white people alone inflicted by the Government of England.

5. This long and obstinate struggle was undertaken, managed, and adjusted by the white people exclusively, as their own quarrel and for their own benefit; and in this great and complex transaction the negro and Indian were ignored—they were not parties to it. If a few hundred of both those races appeared occasionally in the battle-fields on the side of the colonies it was as their slaves and allies, and not as coparties.

6. The first or revolutionary Confederation among the colonies, then their Articles of Confederation, then their Declaration of Independence, and then the present Constitution of the United States, were all acts of the white people of the colonies, undertaken and performed by them exclusively for no object or benefit but their own. The negroes or Indians were not parties to them or either of them; and they were intended to be and were not affected or reached by them. But they were undertaken, done, and performed, and produced precisely then the same results as though the negro and the Indian had not been in being; and those results were intended to be and were limited to the white people alone.

7. No slave negro was made free, or had any addition whatever to his privileges by the Articles of Confederation, or the Declaration of Independence, or the Constitution of the United States; nor were the rights or liberties of any free negro added to by either of those instruments. The condition of both slave and free negro, in every State, continued precisely the same after the Articles of Confederation, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution that it had been before.

8. Naturalization is the admission by Government of a foreigner to the privileges, or a portion of the privileges, of a citizen. Before the present Constitution this power was exercised by each State for itself, which produced diverse and discordant systems. For the purposes of uniformity the power of naturalization was by the States surrendered to the Government of the United States by the Constitution. That the power was delegated and reserved to the extent that the States had exercised. That they had exercised it only to naturalize foreigners, and foreigners of the European nationalities; and the United States receiving from them this power as they had always exercised it were also limited to foreigners of the European branches of the Caucasian race of men.

9. That the fundamental, original, and universal principle upon which our system of government rests, is that it was founded by and for white men; that it has always belonged to and been managed by white men; and that to preserve and administer it now and forever is the right and mission of the white man. When a negro or Chinaman is attempted to be obtruded into it, the sufficient cause to repel him is that he is a negro or Chinaman.

Having thus stated my positions in a short compass, I proceed to lay before the Senate my objections to this most offensive measure. To me this measure and its twin sister that was passed a few days ago by the Senate are the most offensive of all the measures that have ever been before Congress, and upon which I have been called to act. The first was intended to have a peculiar application to my State. As the honorable chairman who reported it avowed frankly it was intended to entrap Kentucky and Delaware, and it is designed especially, as I know by an interview with the commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for that State, that I had a few moments ago, to punish Kentucky; not because Kentucky went into the rebellion, not because Kentucky was true to the Constitution and true to her rights. Yes, Mr. President, my gallant and true State is now an object of more, and is more the special subject of vengeance upon the part of the majority who have possession of this Government than any State in the Union; and the sole cause of offense, the sole reason for these particular feelings of revenge and vengeance is simply that she would not bow her neck to Baal. It is because she had the manliness and the intelligence and the courage to stand by the Constitution, and stand for her rights under the Constitution; and I hope and I believe that she will continue to do that forever.

Mr. President, the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who introduced this measure, the other day attempted to respond to and obviate an objection of mine to the introduction of the Freedmen's Bureau into the State of Kentucky, and he read an extract from the act of Congress passed at the last session, establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, and relied upon that law as justification and authority for carrying the Freedmen's Bureau into Kentucky. He read this clause in the first section of the act of last year:

"That there is hereby established in the War Department, to continue during the present war of rebellion, and for one year thereafter, a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to which shall be committed, as hereinafter provided, the supervision and management of all abandoned lands; and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army."

That learned and profound lawyer assumed that the latter words which I have read authorized the introduction of the Freedmen's Bureau into Kentucky. Taking the whole sentence, it simply authorizes the establishment within the War Department here in the city of Washington of a Freedmen's Bureau. The War Department and other Departments of the Government have different bureaus. Does an act of Congress which authorizes the establishment of any one or all of those bureaus, or, if you please, of another bureau in any Department in Washington city, authorize a branch of that bureau to be carried into Kentucky, or into all the States? Certainly not. And yet that is the absurd and preposterous conclusion to which the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary leaped, that because this law authorized the establishment of a Freedmen's Bureau in the War Department, which bureau should take cognizance of freedmen and refugees from any State that had been affected by the rebellion, therefore the Secretary of War was authorized by this law to carry the Freedmen's Bureau into each and all the States that had been reached by the enemy and had been invaded by the enemy. Sir, it authorizes no such conclusion; but here is the letter of the law itself in another section which places this matter beyond all doubt or cavil:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an assistant commissioner for each of the States declared to be in insurrection, not exceeding ten in number."

It was this section of the law to which I had reference when I admonished the honorable Senator that the Freedmen's Bureau was established in Kentucky without the authority or the semblance of law; and I read the law now to show that it only authorized the sending of assistant commissioners into the rebel States, and Kentucky never having been a rebel State there was no authority whatever to carry the bureau into that State. And yet, General Fiske, who is now in this city, under the direction, I suppose, of the Secretary of War, has established a Freedmen's Bureau, and a military government connected with it, in the State of Kentucky, without authority of law, and invested, or attempted to invest, that Freedmen's Bureau there with the power of striking down the whole fabric of our State government and all of its officers, executive, judicial, and legislative, of prescribing laws repugnant, not only to the laws of our State, but to our constitution, requiring the arbitrary, despotic, military edicts which he has dared to promulge in a State that has always been loyal, to be executed, and denouncing as criminals the courts and the executive officers of the State who presume to execute her constitution and her laws where they are in conflict with this military code. I read the other day—and I am not going to repeat—the code, the unmitigated military despotism that the Secretary of War, by his military satrap, General Fiske, has proclaimed, not for the government of, but to tyrannize over and oppress, the people of Kentucky, and to overthrow their government.

Mr. President, I think the gentlemen will learn something after awhile from experience. They will learn that the Constitution is a very important instrument, that it was most nicely and artistically and ably put together, and that it was put together by master workmen. They will find, I think, as time and events roll on, that as they make one encroachment upon it two or three more will be made necessary, and they will find "confusion worse confounded" the more encroachments and the more innovations they make upon the Constitution. I think that they ought to be admonished now of the folly of persevering in the reckless innovation that so many Constitution tinkers are endeavoring to bring upon that sacred instrument. Mr. President, here is one of them:

"1. That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.
2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

I assume that the second clause does not give a particle of power to Congress which Congress did not possess before. Here is a clause which I will read in the original text:

"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof."

When this amendment which I have read was pending before the Senate, the second section attracted my attention, as it doubtless did that of every gentleman; and the reason that it was not specially objected to was that the original Constitution contained the clause which I have just read, and the original Constitution gave every power that Congress now has under the second section of this amendment. If this second section had not been attached to the amendment, what powers would Congress have had in relation to the abolition of slavery? It would have had the power to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the first section of the amendment which abolished slavery. Does the second section give any added power to Congress? I say it does not—not one particle.

The honorable Senator from Illinois has attempted to scatter wide the effect and operation of the second section, but I think that he is guilty of an error in attempting any such enlargement of power from that section of the amendment. I hold that under that second section Congress can pass only such laws as are necessary and proper for carrying the first section into effect, and that Congress would have every tittle and iota of that power without the second section, under the clause which I have read, and therefore, that that second section is mere tautology, it is a mere investment of power which the original text of the Constitution would have invested Congress with without the second section.

I may ask the honorable Senator and all the members of the Senate who voted for this constitutional amendment if their single and isolated purpose was not to free the negro? Had they any purpose beyond manumitting or freeing the negro? I will answer that question for them. They had none other. They could have had none other. Then the effect and meaning of the amendment is just the same as though "the negro" had been inserted in the amendment. I will insert that phrase by way of testing the true meaning and the utmost scope and operation of this amendment, and let me read it in that way:

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude of the negro, except as a punishment for crime whereof he shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

I ask the honorable Senator if that is not a fair rendition of the amendment. I ask him whether the purpose and the intention, whether the language and operation of this amendment is not limited strictly and literally to the negro. If so, it might have been worded just as I have now read it, and it would not have modified the sense or meaning of the amendment a particle. This is simply, then, an amendment to the Constitution declaring that the negro shall no longer be a slave in the United States, and that is the whole of it.

The honorable Senator himself, I suppose, will not attempt to derive the power to pass this bill from any other clause of the Constitution than this amendment. If the power existed before, and from the adoption of the Constitution, why has it not been attempted to be asserted before? If all the rights with which this bill seeks to invest the negro might have been conferred upon him by other clauses of the Constitution than this amendment, I ask the honorable Senator from Illinois why he and his coadjutors, the friends of the negro, have not in bygone years and from the time of the frenzy of the public mind in the United States in favor of manumission, asserted the power to confer these privileges and these rights upon the negro? There can be but one answer to that question, and that answer is that these powers were not conferred by the Constitution until this amendment was adopted. Now, let us examine and see whether this amendment of the Constitution confers any such powers.

Mr. President, I stated yesterday that there were eight States in the United States that had abolished slavery—five New England States, and New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. I ask the honorable Senator if the measures of those States to abolish slavery were not effective? Did they not achieve the purpose for which they were intended? Did they not abolish slavery? To hear the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK] a person who had read nothing about the subject would come to the conclusion that there never was but one negro in New Hampshire, or at least that the honorable Senator had never heard of or come across the mention of but one negro.

Mr. CLARK. I never said any such thing, nor did I intimate any such thing.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator said he had heard of the transfer of but one negro in the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARK. I said that I had found in the course of my practice one bill of sale; and it was the only bill of sale I ever did see. But if the Senator will look at the census of 1790, I think he will find that we had between three and four hundred slaves.

Mr. DAVIS. I had observed that.

Mr. CLARK. I was aware of the fact.

Mr. DAVIS. In 1820 you did not report any slaves at all, but in 1830 you reported three, so that you had been in the slave trade at least to the extent of three slaves. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will pardon me. Some of those people who held slaves down in the southern country wandered into our country bringing three slaves with them. I think in 1840 somebody brought one. We felt very much aggrieved by it, and hope they will not bring any more.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, how holy, how immaculate! If New Hampshire had just possessed the cotton climate and cotton soil, how many slaves would she have had?

Mr. CLARK. I cannot say. We do not claim that we are any better than other people. We never had so many slaves as others and we got rid of them earlier.

Mr. DAVIS. I think you are very well off if you are not shown to be a great deal worse than other people. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. That may be.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, Mr. President, in 1790 New Hampshire had as many slaves as the honorable gentleman concedes she had. She had altogether six hundred and thirty-three negroes; but in the presence of the refined and delicate Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] I am almost afraid to articulate the word "negro," it seems to shock his nerves so much, [laughter;] but I hope he will get used to it before I am done with this subject. I believe it is the proper term. I believe that ethnologists and anatomists and naturalists all classify the races into the white race, the negro race, and the colored race; all the intermediate races between the white and the negro are called colored. Now, however, some gentlemen are becoming so polite that they cannot afford to use the term

"negro" as applied to an African either by nativity or descent. I have not got quite that far yet.

Here were eight States that held negroes which manumitted them, set them free. What were the consequences of these acts of manumission in the five New England States, in New Jersey, in New York, and in Pennsylvania? What was the legal effect of these acts of manumission? What results and rights did they bring to the negro? Did they do anything more or less than simply to destroy his slavery; that is, the subjection of the negro to the white master? Was there any other result or any other right that came to a single negro in all those States when their acts abolishing slavery passed and became operative, and some of them did not become operative fully, were not consummated into action for very many years. There was a negro sold in the State of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania in the year 1823 under execution to pay a debt, and the reports of his courts show it. But I ask gentlemen what legal results, what privileges, what rights ensued to the negro upon the consummation of the several acts of manumission by those States? Slavery is the subjection of one man to another. Slavery may be legal, or it may be violent and lawless. Where one man by superior force subjects another to him without authority of law, that is unlawful slavery; but where one man or class of men are subject to another man or class of men by authority of law, that is lawful slavery.

Anything that destroys this legal slavery of one man to another manumits him. If it is done under the authority of the laws of the States that authorize owners to emancipate slaves, in relation to an individual master and an individual negro, it destroys the slavery of the individual negro. If it is done by the proper authority, legislative or sovereign, of the State in relation to all negroes, the only effect of this general and multitudinous act is to effect for all simply what had been effected for one by the private act of emancipation of the owner for an individual slave.

Suppose the one mode or the other had been adopted in Kentucky; suppose all the owners of slaves there, by deeds of manumission authorized by our legislation, had liberated all their slaves according to the forms required by our law, what would have been the result? They would have been free. Here you have intervened, and you have passed an amendment to the Constitution which, I say, violates the fundamental law of the land and the principles upon which our Government is based; but I do not make that question at all. I concede it to be concluded against me. I have to receive it as being properly done, and I do so. Then, conceding that you have passed a valid constitutional amendment abolishing slavery in the State of Kentucky and throughout the United States, I ask the two fathers of this proposition, the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Illinois, would or would not slavery in every solitary instance in Kentucky, if the mode had been by private acts of manumission by the owners, have ceased? How would it have ceased? The legal obligation of all men to serve other men, or the legal right of all the owners of slaves to require their slaves to serve them and command their time and the fruits of their labor, would have been extinguished, whether the one mode or the other had been adopted. It would have been extinguished if all the slaves had been manumitted by deeds of manumission. It has only been extinguished by the adoption of the constitutional amendment which I just read. The two modes are different, but their results, their legal consequences, and the rights and privileges which they bring to the negro, are precisely the same. The learned lawyer and Senator from Maryland cannot draw a distinction rightfully taken between the legal effects of the two modes of manumission. I have known thousands of slaves to be liberated by deeds of manumission in Kentucky, and I have adverted to the conventional acts of seven States in relation to the same matter and to bring about the same result. I ask any candid and intelligent lawyer or historian of either of the States I have named, was it ever contended in any court by any lawyer that any other consequence had ensued on the abolition of slavery by a private deed of emancipation or by an act of the Legislature or the convention of a State abolishing slavery generally in the State than the simple abrogation of slavery, that is, the legal subjection of the negro to the owner? What rights, civil or political, did a negro ever acquire heretofore under or by either mode of emancipation?

The honorable Senator from Maryland not only concedes that these civil rights may all be granted, but as I understood him last evening, he conceded that Congress could confer on the free negro a right to vote. The amendment of the Constitution makes the negro free. According to his principle and his theory, but not according to mine, it makes the negro a citizen. I say it does no such thing. It simply abolishes the legal servitude of one man to another; it severs all connection between the slave and the master. Where the act is general, applying to all the slaves in the United States, it has that effect and only that effect as between all owners and all recent slaves. It simply destroys the legal subjection of the slave to the master. That was its sole object. It never was contended for until these times of fanaticism and of unreasoning philanthropy for the negro, that it ever had any other result heretofore.

Suppose a negro liberated by deed of manumission in Kentucky, having got it under the seal of the county, executed according to the forms of the law and enrolled in parchment that he might carry his charter of freedom with him, and with that charter of freedom ten or fifteen years ago he had gone up to a poll where an election was going on in the State of Kentucky, and had claimed a right to vote because the deed of manumission had made him a citizen and invested him with a part of the political sovereignty of the State and of the United States. Such a claim never was thought of and never was made; and it is just as baseless to attempt to make it apply to civil rights or to political rights or the right to vote under this amendment of the Constitution, as it would be under that deed of manumission. In New York, in Massachusetts, in any other State of the Union where slavery has been abolished by the authority of the State, was any such claim ever made? Was it ever allowed? Did your Parsons and your other great lights of the law in Massachusetts ever rule that by the abolition of slavery by her constitution of 1776, or by the bill of rights, one of the consequences and legal effects of that bill of rights or of that constitution in addition to manumitting the slave, was to make the slave a citizen and to confer upon him all civil and political rights? The thing never was thought of. These are errors that have sprung up in the hot-bed of fanaticism and fierce political contention. They are not sound principles of law; they will abide no tests of logic or of law that can be brought to bear upon them.

A few days ago I begged, almost implored, the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to insert a few words in his Freedmen's Bureau bill, which is in fact a part of this. Indeed they might both have been incorporated into the same bill. I importuned him, almost implored him to allow the insertion of a clause providing that that bill should have no application in any State where the courts were open, and where the civil law could be enforced by the courts. I assured him that that was the condition of Kentucky as much so as it was the condition of Illinois. I thought I appealed to him in terms that might almost have brought iron tears down his cheek, but he remained firm and fierce and obdurate. Here is my State that has given half of her white military population to the Army; and about three-fourths of her negro population have been stolen and taken into the Army, making, out of about one hundred and eighty thousand military population, something like one hundred thousand soldiers, white and black. My State has stood by the Constitution. I have stood by it through sunshine and storm, through good and through evil report. On the one hand, my life has been imperiled by the secessionists and their sympathizers, and on the other it has been imperiled by the lawless military tyrants that have appeared in my State and trampled under foot its constitution and laws and the liberties of its people. But I defy them all. I am still true to the Constitution, and I intend to be; and all its enemies, whether they are from Jefferson Davis's host, or whether they are from the civil and military officers of the United States, are equally my foes; and I will strike them with all the feeble force that I can, let the foe to the Constitution and liberties of my countrymen come from the one camp or the other. I will do so while there is a pulsation in my heart, and while a muscle can move in this feeble arm.

But I could not induce the honorable Senator from Illinois to give any immunity whatever to my State; he got up and in his magisterial way he proclaimed the condition of the rebel States (which did not apply to Kentucky) and asked—that was the substance of his interrogatory—are you not in favor of a measure that is so necessary to preserve the order and peace and security and liberties of the people in the rebel States? Let me give you a picture of the condition of things in one of those States. I have before me an address issued by Messrs. Byers, Kyle, and Johnson, Representatives-elect from the State of Arkansas. What do they say in relation to that State, and her claim to be represented in the two Houses of Congress, and in relation to the condition of the courts, and the ability of the courts there to enforce the civil laws? These gentlemen say:

"January, 1864, the loyal citizens of the State of Arkansas elected delegates, held a convention, formed a constitution, and established a provisional State government, until the proper officers under the constitution could be elected and qualified. This constitution, first, abolished slavery; second, declared void the ordinance of secession; third, repudiated the rebel war debt; fourth, provided for the election of officers and for the ratification or rejection of the constitution by a vote of the citizens."

Was that not submission enough? In the name of reason and of justice, what more can be asked from a people?

"The State Legislature assembled and passed a law which provided that no person shall vote at any election until he has first taken and subscribed an oath that he will support the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Arkansas, and that he has not voluntarily borne arms against the United States or the State of Arkansas, or aided, directly or indirectly, the rebellion since the 18th day of April, 1864. The Legislature also ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery."

"Every county in the State has been regularly organized by the election of county and local officers. The courts have been held, and taxes assessed and collected."

"The United States district court for the State has been held, and the laws administered therein, for more than one year past."

That is the condition of Arkansas; and yet the honorable Senator from Illinois inexorably insists that the Freedmen's Bureau shall not only go into ruthless operation in the State of Kentucky but also in the State of Arkansas. I have said here on this floor that gentlemen do not wish reconstruction. They do not intend that Arkansas and the other States lately in rebellion shall be represented in the two Houses of Congress. Why? They have certain favorite party measures, violating the Constitution, violating all justice and the soundest policy, which they are determined to pass—measures of legislation, amendments of the Constitution. They know that if these States are once admitted to representation in the two Houses, if the Union is restored, if it is not kept dissolved by their own arbitrary majority, if the States become reunited in the Union and under the Government, the Representatives and Senators from the late rebel States would defeat all their enormous party measures and all their amendments to the Constitution, that have no other purpose whatever than to enable them to hold on to power per fas aut nefas, without regard to consequences.

I objected the other day that the bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, and this bill, and the various amendments to the Constitution, should not now be passed; and I said that no legislative measure which vitally and deeply affects the southern States should be passed until those States were admitted by their Senators and Representatives to their just influence and power in the Government. I have stated heretofore, and I believe it, that all those States have a truer loyalty now, and a deeper and more faithful devotion to the Constitution and to all of its principles, to our form of government, to the just authority of the Government and all of its officers, than have the mass of the radical party. I may be mistaken in expressing that belief, but it is my deep conviction. When I stated this objection the other day the honorable Senator from Illinois answered me thus:

"What is the Senator from Kentucky here for? Why does he not go home? Why is he sitting here but to pass laws? Is it unconstitutional to pass this bill because some States are not represented here? Why, sir, what sort of a Government would it be if some State, by withdrawing its representation, could take away the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States to pass a law? The absurdity of the proposition is such that it needs not to be argued to be refuted."

That is not my proposition; it is his own proposition. He builds up a man of straw to knock him down. I did not say that if one State or many States chose voluntarily to absent themselves from the halls of legislation therefore legislation should cease. That is the case which the honorable Senator is presenting, but it was not the case which I presented, nor is it the case in fact now existing in the country. Here are eleven States that have acknowledged in every form in which it is possible to make the acknowledgment, their subjection to the Constitution and the laws, their willingness and purpose to abide by the Constitution and laws, and to support them. I have read from the address of the representatives from Arkansas, showing how that State has presented herself. In the form substantially in which that State comes they all ask to be admitted to their share and position in the Government; they ask to have their representatives in the Senate and in the other House. Why should they not have them? Is there any principle of constitutional law or of sound policy that would still exclude them? That is the case which I put. And why are they now in that predicament? Why are they standing out in the cold, unrepresented and paying taxes to this great Government, all their most vital and essential interests being subjected to its legislation, their institutions and their political power in the Government being operated upon permanently in their absence by the passage of constitutional amendments through the two Houses of Congress? Why are they in that predicament, shorn of their constitutional rights and of all their power under the Government? The honorable Senator need not shake his gory locks at me, nor at the southern States; it is not they that keep themselves in that position. It is he and his associates here who have dissolved the Union and who keep it dissolved by shutting the door of the two Houses of Congress upon the face of the Representatives both of the States and of the people of those States. They keep it shut, and they can laugh and they can rejoice at the writhings of their victims. They would feel differently if they occupied their position.

Why do you not admit their members? Can you expect that eleven States thus lawlessly and outrageously and tyrannically excluded from all part in their Government will acquiesce under measures that are passed by you after you have thus dissolved the Union by excluding them, and when your sole purpose in thus excluding them and dissolving the Union was to impose upon them unjust and oppressive measures which you could not pass if they were here present?

Mr. President, I objected to the Freedmen's

Bureau bill upon several constitutional grounds. One was that it blended two of the departments of the Government, and authorized the President to transfer military officers to those quasi courts, and empowered those quasi courts to hear judicial cases and questions that can go constitutionally only before the courts of the United States created in conformity to the Constitution. *How did the honorable Senator answer that objection? He said:

"But he says [alluding to myself] that there is a clear violation of the Constitution in this bill, because judicial power is by it conferred upon the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. He says it is admitted that such power is conferred, and then he reads the clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that the judicial power shall be vested in a Supreme Court and inferior courts, to be established by Congress; and he says these officers of the Freedmen's Bureau are not the courts contemplated by the Constitution. And he reads another clause to show that the right of trial by jury is secured to parties; and he says no jury trial is provided for here. Of course not; but how plain a statement shall answer that whole argument."

Now, let us hear the plain statement of the gentleman that was intended to answer the whole argument:

"Are there not other provisions of the Constitution? Has the Senator from Kentucky never read that the Congress of the United States shall have authority to call forth the militia to put down insurrection and rebellion? Does not the Senator from Kentucky know that from eleven States of this Union every court has been expelled and driven out?"

No, sir; I know no such thing. I know the contrary and I have proved the contrary in relation to Arkansas by the testimony of her Representatives elected to Congress. What is true of Arkansas is substantially true of the other States lately in rebellion. There is not a State in the Union now where the civil law and the civil courts may not be reestablished and put into complete and peaceful operation. There is not a State in which the civil courts and civil law are now deposed by the rebellion. But even if the fact were so in the rebel States, does that prove that Kentucky should be subjected to the Freedmen's Bureau? And yet what I have read is the sole answer which the gentleman deigns to make to all the constitutional objections which I raised to that bill.

Another one was that it created a court of a military bureau, that it made the Commissioner, assistant commissioners, and agents of this bureau judges, and that it invested in them judicial powers, and I read the Constitution to prove that all judicial power in and under the Government of the United States was to be exercised by the Supreme Court or by such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish. I showed, or attempted to show, that this reason of "military necessity" never had any application in Kentucky, or, if any, but for a few days. It has no application in fact and in truth anywhere; and when I object to a military drum-head court-martial that have not sense enough or information enough to know what a writ of habeas corpus is, and on what terms and conditions a writ of habeas corpus should be granted, that are themselves members of a perfect despotism, because every army is a despotism, that know nothing of the principles or essences of liberty; when I object to such men as these being clothed with the judicial powers created by the Constitution of the United States, and invested specially in courts, the Senator from Illinois asks me this question:

"Are there not other provisions of the Constitution? Has the Senator from Kentucky never read that the Congress of the United States shall have authority to call forth the militia to put down insurrection and rebellion?"

The insurrection and rebellion has been put down long enough for a crop to grow and mature; and all nature is sleeping now, to prepare her recuperative energies to bring on another crop, in the depths of winter; and yet when I object to military bureaus and military satraps exercising the judicial powers of the United States that are vested by the Constitution in the courts, the gentleman asks me, have I not read the provision of the Constitution which authorizes the President to call out the militia to put down insurrection?

Mr. President, I took another objection, and a very grave objection, to the Freedmen's Bureau, to its exercise of any jurisdiction in Kentucky, in Arkansas, anywhere. It deprives the citizen of his constitutional right to trial by jury in cases where the matter in contest amounts to twenty dollars. I read the learned opinions of the Supreme Court establishing that invaluable, inappreciable principle of the Constitution. Who would be willing to expunge that principle from the Constitution, the right to trial by jury? In criminal cases it has passed from us so long that we have almost forgotten that it ever had any practical existence. We have had the practical enjoyment of the right of trial by jury in civil cases in Kentucky; but here comes forward this measure of despotism, of iron military despotism, backed up by the first lawyer of this body, and who gravely—no, not gravely, but with perfect indifference—introduces a bill into the Senate of the United States to abolish our courts, State and Federal, in Kentucky, so far as controversies between the free negro and the white man may arise, and to vest them, against the plain and positive provisions of the Constitution, in a sort of military subordinates. I objected, in addition, that it deprives the people of the right of trial by jury. To these, and other grave objections which I make to the bill, the honorable Senator from Kentucky not read the provision which authorizes the militia to be called out to tor contents himself with this reply:

"Has the Senator from Kentucky not read the provision which authorizes the militia to be called out to put down insurrection?"

Was ever such a profound and able argument made in any body as that?

But, Mr. President, I will hurry on to consider the provisions of the pending bill. The Senator says that the principal matter, the gravamen of the bill, is in the first section. I will read it:

That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery.

I will ask the honorable Senator, what rights do these words establish? The section goes on afterwards and specifics:

But the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Again:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person who under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is rather late in the day, and my friend from Kentucky will take some time yet to conclude his remarks. I propose, with his consent, that the bill now be passed over for to-day, and that the vote be taken to-morrow at two o'clock, if that is the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to be heard for a short time before the vote is taken.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not know before that my friend from Delaware proposed to say anything upon this bill. Let us then fix three o'clock to-morrow as the hour for taking the vote; I am sure there will be no objection on the part of the chairman of the committee to make this arrangement.

Mr. DAVIS. I am wound up; I am obliged to run down. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall for myself make no objection to taking the vote at two or three o'clock to-morrow. If it is understood generally in the Senate that there is not a disposition to protract the debate longer than say three o'clock to-morrow, I am perfectly willing to adjourn now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do I understand the Senator from Maryland as moving an adjournment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir, with that understanding, that the vote shall be taken to-morrow at three o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the consent of the Senator from Maryland, I will state that that is entirely satisfactory to me, with this further understanding, that if amendments be proposed a reasonable time shall be allowed for their explanation. It is possible the Senator from Kentucky will not occupy until three o'clock. I desire to propose one amendment to the bill. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] tells me that he wishes to propose an amendment. I have no desire to engage in any general discussion of the bill, but simply to address myself to the amendment I shall propose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would say that of course in fixing the hour at three o'clock I should not expect, so far as I am concerned—I can speak only for myself—to prevent the offering of any amendment and the making of any statement in reference to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Say four o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps we had better have it understood, as amendments are likely to be offered, that after three o'clock any amendment may be offered and any amendment may be explained. What I mean is to have it understood that we can get a vote to-morrow without protracting the session unnecessarily. With that understanding I am willing that we shall now adjourn until to-morrow, and then at sometime after the Senator from Kentucky shall have concluded his remarks we may act on such amendments as may be offered.

Mr. DAVIS. I submit to the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know what the Senator from Illinois means by allowing a statement or explanation of an amendment. The amendment which I shall propose I shall wish to present in some decent shape to the Senate. I do not want any misunderstanding on this point. I do not wish to discuss the bill generally, except for the purpose of illustrating the amendment I shall propose. That amendment will be to strike out the last section of the bill. The Senator from Oregon wishes to propose an amendment, and of course, I presume, to explain it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think there will be no difficulty on that point. With the understanding that all general debate on the bill shall close at three o'clock to-morrow, I have no objection to an adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a privileged question. My colleague, Mr. HULBURD, has been called away by the serious illness of a near relative. I ask leave of absence for him for a week.

There being no objection, the leave was granted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask leave to make a brief statement.

No objection was made.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the reading of the statement which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is in the Albany Argus of January 25.

The Clerk read as follows:

"THE CONKLING PROVISIO.—New York, which now abridges suffrage on account of color, would lose two or three Representatives in the event of its refusal to remove the existing restriction."—Troy Whig.

"It is probably a recommendation with the Representative of New York, of the vindictive and coercive school to which Mr. CONKLING belongs, that the measure he proposes punishes and in a measure disfranchises his State. In the original formation of the Constitution New York surrendered a great deal of her position, and consented to an equality of representation with smaller and less populous States. The power she has given to others has been ungenerously used against her; and instead of readjusting the measure of representation on the basis of equality he brings forward a contrivance to aggravate the injustice at the expense of his own State. Mr. CONKLING's scheme, like the census of Depew, shows how little pride in their own State the new-light politicians have, and in the great struggle of politics and of sectional greed and rapacity how false they prove to their State. An attorney who so disgraces the rights of his clients, under some delusion of fanaticism or fancied revelation of the higher law, would be justly regarded with contempt."

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, of the spirit of this article, or of the assault made upon me personally, I, of course, shall take no notice.

I rise to correct the error of fact into which the writer seems to have fallen. The proviso denounced, having passed this House by more than two thirds of its votes, and awaiting only the favorable action of the Senate to go to the Legislatures of the States, should not be incumbered by misrepresentation so gross as this.

I take occasion, therefore, to state the facts as they are, not from any pride of paternity, but to give the proviso a fair hearing before the public.

It is not true that New York will lose by it in any event. Should New York disfranchise every black man within her borders, and should every southern State give every black man the ballot, New York even then could not lose a single Representative. This is made clear by the United States census of 1860.

New York had in 1860 only forty-nine thousand and five colored persons all told, and this was twenty per cent. less than twenty years ago. The number of population necessary to one Representative is one hundred and twenty-seven thousand, so that should New York shut out all her black people the number is too small to take away a single Representative, and too small to add one should all the blacks be counted.

What is true of New York is still more true of every other State heretofore a non-slaveholding State, because small as is the colored population of the State of New York, it is larger than that of any other northern State, Pennsylvania alone excepted.

The House will see that under the amendment no northern State would lose a single Representative to which it is entitled now, even should the southern people admit their entire colored population to the right to vote. This is not to be expected, I take it, for the present at least.

With the amendment working as the southern States will probably allow it to work, at all events until the blacks are better prepared to become voters than they are now, the necessary result will be to increase the representation of New York and all the other States in which the colored element is small.

Had we adopted the idea of making male voting citizens the basis of representation, it might well and truly have been said that New York would lose.

By the census taken only last year there were in New York three hundred and ninety-nine thousand four hundred and fifty-six aliens, that is to say, unnaturalized foreigners. They are all counted now in the basis of representation. They all will be counted under the amendment as we passed it. But in the basis of voting citizens they would all be excluded, and the State would lose at once three Representatives and the fraction of a fourth. Several other northern States would lose, some of them in still larger proportion, by the voting basis.

Why should they submit to such a loss?

The loss would go to the South. Why?

Because emigration moves on lines of latitude, not on lines of longitude. Those coming here from the Old World keep in the same range of temperature to which they are accustomed. They do not land at Charleston or New Orleans, but at New York, and then spread westward. Migration from the North to the South is likely to be of our native population, carrying citizenship with them and swelling the basis of representation wherever they go, whereas the North will always have a large infusion of foreigners not yet citizens. And therefore, if we should base representation on male citizens alone, we should inflict on the North a perpetual and increasing loss, and give the South a perpetual and growing gain. The amendment we have adopted takes from the States North and West nothing, and it has the further merit of providing not only that all citizens shall be represented as they now are, but that all foreigners shall be represented also as they now are.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I desire to state that I was confined to my room all yesterday by a sick headache. If I had been present, I should have voted for the constitutional amendment reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. BOYER. I desire simply to say that my colleague, Mr. ANCONA, was taken seriously ill on Monday last, and is now confined to his bed. This fact will explain his absence from the Hall during the last few days.

NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to improve the navigation of the Mississippi river to the cities of St. Anthony and Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Should not that bill properly go to the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the bill has relation to public lands.

COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mines and Mining be allowed to have a clerk, who shall receive the usual compensation fixed by the House for clerks of committees.

I will only say that that committee has now so much business on its hands that it cannot get along without a clerk.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to the resolution.

QUARANTINE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, relative to quarantine in the port of New York; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELIOT. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BOYER. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw that call for a moment till I can make a statement in the nature of a personal explanation.

Mr. ELIOT. I withdraw the call for that purpose.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. MORRILL reported, from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1865; and moved that the bill be printed and be made the special order for consideration by the House on Thursday, the 8th instant, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRILL] at what time he proposes to have action upon the loan bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Just as soon as the business of the House will permit.

TAX ON WHISKY.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire also to ask a question. I see that the internal revenue commission have recommended a reduction of one dollar per gallon in the tax upon whisky. Unless it be known to the country whether that recommendation meets the approbation of Congress, many million dollars of revenue may be lost during the next few months, because many manufacturers will suspend operations until the question shall be settled. I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that unless the committee intend to adopt, in that particular, the recommendation of the commission, a joint resolution declaring that Congress will not reduce that tax ought to be introduced and passed. Unless something of this kind be done, great confusion will be experienced in the country, and the Government will lose a very large amount of revenue.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And destroy the interest of western farmers.

Mr. MORRILL. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I will say that the Committee of Ways and Means have not yet taken up the report of the commission. It has not yet been printed by the Public Printer. On this matter, if an original question, I may say that the Committee of Ways and Means would have come to the same conclusion as the revenue commissioners; but the duty having been established, I take the liberty to say, if they do come to that conclusion, it will be with very great reluctance.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Is the question before the House on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made a remark?

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is the bill reported from the committee.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I want the same privilege our leaders have. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman may be heard.

There was no objection.

Mr. WENTWORTH. In reference to introducing resolutions calling for expression of members of this House on that subject, I would advise members first to see for themselves. We have ordered an extra number of that report, together with the bill accompanying it; and I suppose each member would at least be entitled to have a copy upon his desk. Then, when each member shall have read that report and bill he will be prepared to judge whether it will affect him or his constituents; that is unless we have, what is too often done in this House, men rise in their place and call for the previous question, and ask their friends to sustain them because they happened to submit the resolution. On this occasion I call on members to read the report and bill for themselves before the question shall be sprung on them.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Thursday next after the morning hour.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. DRIGGS. I rise to a privileged question. I am now on three important committees, and I find it impossible to attend to the duties of them all. I ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to be excused, being on two other committees.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. DRIGGS. While I am up I will attend to another matter. I understand under the new rule a member is not allowed to ask unanimous consent to record his vote unless he were present when the vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. That is the rule.

Mr. DRIGGS. I was absent yesterday when the vote was taken on the constitutional amendment in reference to the basis of representation, engaged in business connected with the public lands, by order of the House. I regret I was not present; if I had been, I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. NEWELL also stated he was unavoidably absent; and, if present, would have voted in the affirmative.

LAW OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to examine the laws of the Territorial Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, and make inquiry into the nature of certain acts concerning free negroes and the relations of master and servant; and report by bill or otherwise.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 94, to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of seamen and others borne upon the books of vessels wrecked or lost in the naval service," approved July 4, 1864, and for other purposes; and Senate joint resolution No. 25, tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in action in Mobile bay on the 5th of August, 1864; and that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES DESTROYED DURING THE WAR.

Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted joint resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia concerning the repair of bridges, &c., destroyed by the Union armies as a means of safety during the rebellion; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

TRANSFER FROM VIRGINIA TO WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LATHAM also presented joint resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia, asking for speedy action in consenting to the transfer of Berkeley and Jefferson counties from Virginia to West Virginia; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RAILROADS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LATHAM also presented a joint resolution of the same Legislature, asking for the passage of the bill entitled "A bill granting lands to the State of West Virginia to aid in the construction of certain railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

HOSPITAL BUILDINGS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LATHAM. I also ask unanimous consent to submit for action at this time a joint resolution donating certain property of the United States to boards of education of certain townships of Taylor county, West Virginia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read the joint resolution.

It provides that the buildings and lumber of the United States at Grafton, Webster, and New Creek, West Virginia, lately used for hospitals and for quartermaster and commissary purposes, be donated to the boards of education of those townships.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not object to that resolution going to the Committee on Military Affairs, but I do object to its passage now.

The joint resolution was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplemental to the several acts relating to pensions; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask that certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, which were presented yesterday, be considered as presented to day in open House, and that they be ordered to be printed.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs inquire into and report upon the expediency of dispensing with the Light-House Board, and placing the duties thereof in charge of a bureau of the Navy Department.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to that resolution going to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Let it go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KASSON. I prefer that it should go to the Naval Committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It belongs to the Committee on Commerce. If the gentleman will so modify it I will not object.

Mr. KASSON. Very well.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ELIOT called for the special order.

RAILROAD FARES AND FREIGHTS.

Mr. BIDWELL. I ask unanimous consent to report back a resolution from the Committee on Agriculture and have it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ELIOT. I will yield a moment for that purpose.

Mr. BIDWELL. The author of the resolution, on my right, [Mr. HARDING, of Illinois,] wants to have a word to say on the resolution, and I desire it to be so placed that he can have that opportunity.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let us hear the resolution read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so graduating taxation for revenue upon "fares and rates" charged by railroad companies and others for the transportation of passengers and freights over the highways of commerce, that while necessary revenue shall be derived, relief may incidentally result to the agricultural and other interests of the country from the high, oppressive impositions that are now crushing those interests, especially in the West; and whether, by the judicious and lawful exercise of the power of Congress to raise revenue and to regulate trade and commerce among the States, relief may not be afforded to the farmers and consumers of the country from the exorbitant exactions of combined monopolies.

Mr. BIDWELL. I observe that there are two questions involved in this resolution. One is the raising of revenue, the other, and a very important one, that of the constitutionality of the measure. It will be seen, therefore, why the Committee on Agriculture thought proper to refer it back before going so far as to elaborate a measure on the subject. I hope that an opportunity may be allowed for the author of the resolution to be heard.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I do not design, under the calls for the regular order of business, to detain the House from the consideration of the subject which they have determined to consider at this time. I simply desire to say that the operations of the railroads of the United States present facts of great importance to the country, and furnish great reason for restraining and regulating legislation. The influence of these facts is manifested by the communications which every mail brings to us from the great West. The numerous meetings of the people in assemblies and in conventions, and their speeches, resolutions, and resolves, all manifest themselves so plainly that no member upon this floor can have failed to notice that discontent and complaint pervade the entire West. In this belief, and referring to the numerous publications upon this subject, I will leave the House to judge how important these facts must be, connected with the transportation system of this country, to produce so much attention in times of so much interest.

It is true, according to my observation, that beyond the necessary imposition for the cost of transportation, exorbitant exactions, amounting to the imposition of export and import duties, are imposed upon the productions of the agriculture of the West. I wish to be understood that the railroads of the country, especially in the West, are doing what Congress itself is prohibited from doing by the Constitution. We cannot levy an export duty, but the railroads do restrict commerce and completely and effectually suppress and inhibit it in many instances. In Illinois, for instance, if gentlemen will look, they will see that railroads constructed by land grants, constructed for the public use by contributions of individuals, and by taking (of public) lands without compensation to individuals for right of way, are operating upon a system of charges exceeding, in some cases ten dollars a ton for a hundred miles. Greater charges are exacted, for instance, from Rock Island to Davenport than are exacted from Pittsburg to Chicago.

The combinations which exist in reference to the means of transportation have destroyed all the ordinary competition in that business, and left the entire West at the mercy of these combinations. They almost control the entire channels of commerce throughout the country. The rivers, our last means of transportation, are about to shake hands with the railroads, and in many instances a union is already effected by which we pay the same rates upon the water that we do upon the railroads.

It is already written in the "books" that "even now in the United States railroad companies control legislation in many of the States; that the day for general combination is approaching;" and it is already seen and felt, by my constituents at least, "that of all governments the most exhaustive and oppressive is that of the transporters." When under the lead of the Vanderbilts and others, these lines on the rivers shall be completely combined with the railroads, we may well distrust the future of our country. I was gladdened by the unanimity with which this House asserted the power to authorize transportation, and but for the provision giving the right to all railroads to demand unlimited compensation, I should have voted for it with all my heart. I then believed it released or tended to relax the obligations of land-grant railroads, and especially the Illinois Central, from contracts to transport for Government without compensation; and I now think that Congress should further assert this power to prevent gross impositions by these public agents upon the interests of the country. We can legislate to facilitate inland intercourse directly or indirectly by graduating taxation upon their earnings according to the charges by which these earnings are exacted, so as to limit them within fair bounds.

And now, sir, in this state of things, I ask the House to give to this subject such attention as will enable them to vote relief at least to the constituents of the gentlemen from the West.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague has spoken and spoken truly of the railroad combinations and monopolies in the Northwest which are destroying all the productive interests of the people of our State. His constituents will thank him for his good words.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. A proposition to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I only interrupted my colleague to thank him for his pertinent observations on a subject in which my constituents have a common interest with his own. It is the oppression of the great producing interests of our constituents by the exactions of the railroads in our State. Our people must have relief in some way from the present state of things, and as one means of relief I wish to say we must look to the improvement of the rapids of the Mississippi river and Rock river, and that the public interest will demand just and liberal appropriations by Congress for that purpose. But there is a matter in this connection to which I wish to call the attention of my colleague [Mr. HARDING] and of the House. It is the obstruction of the navigation of the Mississippi river by building railroad bridges across that river, which fearfully impede and obstruct its navigation, and which make our people more and more subject to the extortions of the railroads. The two bridges already built have proved great and serious impediments to the free navigation of the river, and added to the cost of the transportation of what they have had to send to market. If the Mississippi can be closed up or obstructed, our farmers will have to seek their markets over the railroads, with their frightful rates of freight, consuming their hard earnings. I allude to this now, to say that this question of obstructing this river by bridges is becoming a very important one, as many bridges are proposed to be built. There is already a bill before Congress to legalize and make a post route of one of these bridges recently completed at Clinton, Iowa, which has proved a great obstruction to the free navigation of the river, and when the time comes, if the bill ever gets favorably reported upon, I shall appeal to the House in the interests of the people in the valley of the Mississippi, to protect the great natural channels of communication from obstruction and impediment created by these bridges. I wish to be understood as not being opposed to bridging the river at any point, if it can be done without interfering to any extent with the free navigation of the stream, but the bridges already built do interfere, and no more such can be permitted to be built.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I accord in the remarks of my colleague in relation to the obstructions of the railroads.

Mr. ELIOT. I must now demand the regular order of business.

The Committee on Agriculture was then discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NATIONAL MILITARY AND NAVAL ASYLUM.

Mr. SCHENCK. At the last Congress a law was passed chartering a military and naval asylum for invalid soldiers and sailors. It was found impossible, from the great number of corporators named in the bill, after three or four attempts made, to get together a quorum of them so as to organize and establish the corporation under the law. The Senate has passed a bill, (S. No. 54,) which is now upon the Speaker's table, amending the charter in such way as to enable them to go on and elect a board of directors. It becomes important that they should be enabled to do so, that they may obtain the title to property which will probably be offered to the corporation. I therefore ask that the bill may be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 54) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate a national military and naval asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States," was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. ELIOT called for the special order.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of House bill No. 204, to regulate further the registering of vessels.

The bill was read at length. It provides that no ship or vessel which has been recorded or registered as an American vessel pursuant to law, and which shall have been licensed or otherwise authorized to sail under a foreign flag or the protection of a foreign Government during the existence of the rebellion, shall be deemed or registered as an American vessel, or shall have the rights and privileges of American vessels, except under an act of Congress authorizing such registry.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ELIOT. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 56.

Mr. GARFIELD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELIOT and BOYER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPALDING called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a few words upon this bill before a vote is taken upon its passage.

Mr. SPALDING. Is it in order to offer an amendment now?

The SPEAKER. Not after the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. Will my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] yield me a few moments of his time before he takes his seat?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will do so.

Mr. SPALDING. I want but five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, without having examined carefully into the navigation laws of this country, I have looked enough into them to be satisfied of one or two things, which I desire to suggest to this House before the vote is taken upon the passage of this bill.

In the first place, we have navigation laws borrowed from those monuments of tyranny, the navigation laws of Great Britain, which more than any other laws ever enacted by the Parliament of Great Britain were the cause of the American Revolution. Among other features of our navigation laws is one that forbids the buying a vessel from a foreign country and sailing it under our flag, if it is a foreign bottom, no matter how cheap we may purchase it, or under what circumstances we may obtain it. Unless we ourselves lay out upon it more in value than the original value of building the bottom abroad, we cannot sail it under the American flag. That, of course, shuts out all foreign-built vessels, however valuable they may be at any time. But I am not discussing that now, nor will I enter into a consideration of that subject at this time.

But the question now under consideration is this: during this great war, when we were unable to protect our shipping on the high seas, to protect our ships sailing under our flag, there were many patriotic American citizens who simply registered their vessels for sailing under a foreign flag, that they might carry on their commerce without having their property destroyed by the pirates infesting the seas. Now, when eight hundred thousand tons of American shipping have thus been transferred by registry or by sale to a foreign flag, it is proposed that none of it shall ever be returned except by express act of Congress. One fifth of our entire merchant marine has left us, and by this bill all that will be excluded from our merchant service entirely.

Now, one gentleman who has spoken upon this question has spoken of these vessels as deserters in the same way precisely as we speak of deserters from our Army. I care far more about our tonnage on the sea than I care about the individual shipper who took a register under a foreign flag. It is not a question now with me what the status of the shipper himself may be. I do not propose to injure all the interests of our merchant marine for the purpose of spiting a few of our speculators. It seems to me it would show a great want of proper policy on our part to do so.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LYNCH. What I did say was this: that it would be very impolitic for any Government to encourage the desertion of its citizens with their property during a period of war, those citizens identifying their interests for the time being with the interests of the enemy. My remarks had no reference whatever to "skip-pers." I did say, and I now repeat, that every man who during the war put his vessel under a foreign flag identified his interests with those of the foreigners who were assisting in the destruction of our commerce; and if we encourage such desertion, and pay a premium upon it, some of our citizens will always desert us with their property in time of war. I hold that we should not give encouragement to conduct of this sort.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, if in time of war I own a piece of property which I cannot keep safely in this country, and the keeping of which will ruin me pecuniarily, I ask whether the Congress of my country should prohibit me from selling that property to foreigners, or if I have sold it, prohibit me from repurchasing it and using it here in my country where I first acquired that property. If I sell to a Canadian or any other foreigner an engine which I own, and which I have used perhaps to operate a saw-mill on the Ohio, is it right that I should be prohibited from repurchasing that engine by and by, and using it in this country? Now, sir, this bill proposes that, whenever an American vessel shall have been sold to a foreigner, or even registered to sail under a foreign flag, such vessel shall never be permitted to reënter our service without special authority from Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this bill is to operate upon bona fide sales, or only upon such as are simulated.

Mr. GARFIELD. It covers, I understand, all sales, bona fide as well as simulated.

Mr. ELIOT. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I think I can show that he misapprehends entirely the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ELIOT. This bill does not refer to sales of vessels at all, neither sham sales nor bona fide sales. It only covers a class of cases where American ship-owners have obtained for their vessels the protection of foreign Powers, have procured permits or licenses from foreign Governments, thus waiving the benefit of their own flag for the sake of securing the protection of foreign Powers. The bill provides that in such cases the vessel shall no longer be deemed an American vessel, unless the party interested can satisfy Congress that the vessel ought to be granted an American register.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the case as the gentleman states it is all the worse for his cause. He says that the bill does not apply to a case where a vessel was sold, alienated, to a foreigner, but merely to cases where vessels were registered to sail under a foreign flag which could protect them. What the owners in the latter cases did is not nearly so bad as the act of those who alienated their vessels to foreigners. I say that the owner of a vessel, if our flag cannot protect it, ought to be entitled to register his vessel under a flag that can protect it; and when we are again able to protect it, I am in favor, if not for his sake, at least for the sake of the merchant service, of allowing his vessel to come back and sail under our flag, and thus increasing our tonnage.

I maintain that this question is a matter of tonnage, and not of men. I am in favor of the amendment suggested by my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING,] that all these cases be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, who may look into the question of the loyalty of the owner, and that, if he be a loyal man, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to reregister his vessel. I would be the last man to grant any favor to a rebel; but I would grant favors to the American merchant service. I would increase our tonnage. Some gentlemen here propose to wait for the increase of our tonnage until the ship-builders of Maine and New Hampshire, and other States on the Atlantic sea-board, can build us vessels. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] has said that in Nova Scotia vessels can be built at a cost of forty dollars to the ton, while in Maine their construction costs $100 to the ton. Therefore, it is urged, we cannot compete with foreign ship-builders.

Now, I do not propose to give the men in the Atlantic cities sixty dollars on the hundred more, when we can get, without paying out our money all over the country, increased service for the country by simply reregistering the vessels which we could not protect.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman tell me what difference it makes to the shipper in New York whether he imports his goods in British bottoms or in American bottoms? What difference is there in insurance? And will he tell me further, whether it is not a fact that of the goods imported more than seventy-five per cent. does not come in British bottoms?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer the gentleman with one general fact, namely, that for some reason deemed good by the owners of those vessels which have been registered under foreign flags they desire to come back. That is proved. If it is for the advantage of the ships to come back for business they will come back.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman speaks not of ship-builders but of merchants. He says that merchants would forthwith have to pay enhanced prices for vessels. I ask him whether he cannot employ British ships on precisely the same terms to import his goods as American ships? Let him answer that question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we are talking now of shipping, and not of the interests of merchants in New York. We are talking of our general power to export and import goods; and now, when it has proved that a part of our tonnage has gone during the war, we are asked to keep it out in order that the ship-builders of this country may have the job of filling the vacuum. I propose we shall fill that vacuum by the most expeditious method in our power.

I call this House to witness that at the last session I declared, as I declare now, myself forever opposed to all monopolies, whether of railroads, ship-builders, or of any other association which proposes to cripple the commerce, whether among the States or upon the high seas, of the Republic of the United States. I look on this as one of those monopolies, and I am surprised my able and distinguished friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] from the Galena district, should vote in any other way than against this measure, he being so strong an anti-monopoly man as he has so often avowed himself to be on this floor. I do not care what political company it puts me in; I do not care who associates with me; I shall associate with every man who puts his foot down upon these monopolies, as I declare this to be.

I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING,] as I promised to do; but I will hold the floor to call the previous question, as I have promised the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to do.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the merits of this question are fairly understood by the House; and it will be my purpose in a very short space of time to put them in possession of the facts.

This bill, entitled "An act further to regulate the registration of vessels," is one of two things: it is a bill either of pains and penalties, that is, a bill intended to punish American citizens who were ship-owners, and who during the rebellion risked their ships on the ocean under license derived from some foreign Power, or else it is a premium to that class of our country which has most to do with building ships. It is one of the two, and gentlemen cannot evade it. They must either determine to punish these ship-owners under foreign licenses to protect them from rebel cruisers, or else this is intended as a gratuity to the ship-building interest of our country. I object to it on either ground. It is unfair, unjust; it is not honest legislation for the whole country.

Why, so far as regards the first proposition, it being designed to punish our citizens who ran their vessels under a license, I appeal to history to answer if we had a vessel on the ocean during the war of 1812 with Great Britain unless that vessel had the license of the French or some other foreign Government. And who in those days ever undertook to say that the vessel should be confiscated by the American Government, or its owners and navigators punished because they tried that scheme of rescuing their property from the depredations of the enemy? Nobody, no man in the world.

Well now, what is the pretense here? That disloyal citizens owned and ran these vessels that were protected from the ravages of the enemy by some license under Great Britain or France, or some other naval Power. Were they disloyal? The bill does not say it. For aught we know the most loyal citizens we have in the country resorted to this means of running their ships in safety across the perilous ocean. The question might arise whether that did afford them protection. And those that were rescued from the perils which environed them, and are now ready to contribute to the benefit of American commerce, are to be turned backward by the effect of this bill and told that they are no longer to be regarded as American ships. That is it. They were built in America, they were owned in America, and they were registered in America; but because they ran on the ocean and escaped the perils of the rebel flag they are now to be turned backward and to be told, "You are not to have the privilege of an American register." That is one phase of the question.

The other phase of the question is, can we afford to exclude the vessels which now seek to be employed under their American registers on any account like this, even if it be to favor the ship-building interest of the country? Why, Mr. Speaker, our United States tonnage at the breaking out of the rebellion was something like five million tons. The Secretary of the Treasury says that there have been transferred to foreign owners during the rebellion eight hundred thousand tons; and there have been destroyed by the piratical flag one hundred and ten thousand tons. Now, here is the sum of nine hundred and ten thousand tons of our commercial marine which has gone out of our commercial list. We are in want, greatly in want, of vessels to do our carrying trade at this moment upon the ocean. We want to increase our marine; and instead of taking measures in Congress to increase it, as I had hoped would be done, we are excluding such as are already invested with American registers, because they have saved themselves from danger of destruction on the ocean.

Now, I wish to call attention to one other fact. By the census report of 1860 I find that the annual value of products of ship-building in the United States in that year was $11,667,661. On turning to the census report of Maine and Massachusetts I find the annual value of the products of ship-building of Maine in 1860 was $1,137,814, and of Massachusetts $1,678,605. Thus the two States of Maine and Massachusetts have one fourth part of the products of all the ship-building interest of the United States.

Now, those States have lost nothing of their interest since the year 1860. It is rather on the increase, and now they are in a condition to take advantage of a bill like this proffered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. They have their ships in the course of construction if not already constructed, and they are ready to enter the market for the high rates which must necessarily follow the contraction of our commercial marine by the passage of a bill like this. I contend that it is the height of folly for an American Congress at this time, when we have a surplus of products to be sent abroad, to curtail our American shipping. The effect of such a bill as this will undoubtedly be to put up prices; and those of my associates from the West who are so strenuous in denouncing all these conspiracies or combinations to restrict us from the West to the East are interested in opening this navigation from our seaboard to Europe, and from one part of our coast to another.

Mr. PIKE. I ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not want to be interrupted at this moment by my friend from Maine. I would say to him that I understand that he, as a ship-owner, would prefer an American register to an English one for his ship.

Mr. PIKE. I merely wanted to ask a question for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will allow him one minute further.

Mr. SPALDING. I was only about to say that the amendment which I did contemplate offering, and one which I may yet put in the shape of a bill if this is voted down, was to leave this whole subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. By my contemplated bill I intended to provide that all vessels owned wholly by citizens and residents of the United States shall be entitled to American registers, under such restrictions and limitations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall see fit to impose. Now, if that does not open the door sufficiently for pains and penalties, then I do not know what would. I think that would be the wisest and most advisable course for us to pursue in legislating upon this subject, if we legislate at all. But if we pass this bill we are ruling out of our commercial marine ships that are necessary to the country, and never more so than at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield the floor for ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. BLAINE. I think it important that the House should come back to a distinct understanding of the question involved in this bill, and I will state it as briefly as possible. At the beginning of the war, as I can show from reliable statistics in my hand, we had twenty-five hundred thousand tons of shipping engaged in the foreign trade. As the war grew hot and dangers multiplied on the ocean, eight hundred thousand tons of this shipping took refuge under a foreign flag. The flag of our own nation was hauled down, and protection was sought under the flag of our neutral enemy, Great Britain. I do not question the right of the owners of this shipping to act in this way, and many who did so are honorable and patriotic men. All contend is that, having made their election, they shall abide by it. They escaped all the hazards to which our flag was subjected; they gained all the profits of their alien connection; and for one I am not now willing to put them on the same ground with those ship-owners who took all the risks of standing by the American flag in good report and in evil report, in our dark days as well as in our bright days. The ship-owners who took British registers escaped the heavy war risks to which American registers were subjected, and now to place them on the same footing with those who hazarded everything rather than sail under a foreign flag would be flagrantly unjust. To contend for such a policy is as illogical and absurd as the position of those who claimed for the southern rebels all the advantages and immunities of belligerents outside of the Union and citizens inside of it at the same time. The ship-owners who changed their registers sought the protection of Great Britain when there was danger at home; and now they wish, when that danger is over, to return to our flag and share the profits that can be derived from American registry. I think, sir, it would be cruelly unjust for the American Congress to permit this policy, and thus turn their backs on those ship-owners who, under all the seductions of profit and against all the perils of war, refused to take refuge for a single hour under any other flag than that which was floating over the armies of the Union, and which protects us in this Capitol to-day.

I have said, sir, that many who sought these foreign registers were high-minded, honorable, and patriotic men. I am personally acquainted with some of them, and it gives me pleasure to speak of them in this way. But, sir, there is good reason to believe that all of them were not of this class; that some of them were unpatriotic and even criminal, and that, while securely concealed behind their British registers, they were sharing in the enormous profits derived from running our blockade, and engaging, to the detriment of the Union cause, in all the illicit commerce which the English flag covered during the four years of bloody war from which we have just emerged. I think the American Congress should be slow to allow even one man who has acted thus to bring his property back under the protection of our laws. We may not be able to punish such men by criminal prosecutions, but we certainly should not go out of our way to show them favors and confer benefits upon them.

But I do not put this question on the ground of simply giving their just dues to those who took this course with their shipping, much less do I base my action on a feeling of "spite," as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has intimated. I conceive that it involves a point of future interest and of far-reaching importance, because if we treat these ship-owners who left our flag with the same liberality that we do those who stood by it, we offer a sort of premium to our whole navigation interest to seek foreign registers the moment we have a war with any Power. And should we allow the eight hundred thousand tons of shipping now under discussion to come back under our flag, you will see double or triple that amount leave us if we should unfortunately become engaged in another war. I think that consideration should have great influence on our action on this question.

One word more, Mr. Speaker. The whole tone of the speeches we have had from both the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING and Mr. GARFIELD] was for free trade. They urge that we shall buy our ships wherever we can get them cheapest, and that all restrictions as to registry should be abolished. Well, sir, if we are prepared to reduce this free trade theory to practice, why not have it in everything? There is no branch of American industry that is today so little protected and so much oppressed by our revenue laws as ship-building. It is taxed at all points, and nearly taxed to death; and I submit to these new advocates of free trade that it would be better to begin with some interest that is essentially protected by our laws to-day. If we are going to have free trade, let us have it equally and impartially applied to all the industrial interests of the land; but for myself I am opposed to it altogether. In theory and in practice, I am for protecting American industry in all its forms, and to this end we must encourage American manufactures and we must equally encourage American commerce.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] for five minutes.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to say a few words to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who gives as a reason why this bill should not be passed that the West wishes to ship its products abroad, and needs additional shipping for that purpose. I will ask the gentleman to tell me why the West cannot ship from the port of Boston or New York, or from other ports, to Liverpool, as well in British bottoms as in American? Would they have to pay a penny more to do so? They would not; and I may state this fact to him, that of the imports into this country for the last ten years more than seventy-five per cent. have been brought in British bottoms. So that the West does not suffer in any way whether these vessels are brought back or not.

Now, as to free trade, I have this to say, that if the navigation laws are to be broken down and free trade to be instituted, do it squarely, and not simply allow these fellows to come back, who, rather than pay the war rate of insurance and protect their property in that way, sneaked off under the flag of Great Britain, and desire to come back now that a peace has been restored which they did not help to bring about.

For one, if I have to vote for the one measure or the other, I shall cheerfully vote for the foreigner to come here and take out an American register upon equal terms with American ship-owners rather than vote to allow these fellows to return who went off under a foreign flag in time of danger to save insurance. If we are to give American registers to any part British tonnage let us give them to those who were never with and of course never deserted.

As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has referred to me as a ship-owner, I will say that I am sorry that I am not; although under present circumstances, when shipping is so much depressed, it would add very little to my humble profits. This bill is a matter of but small consequence to the State of Maine. It does not affect, I believe, a single vessel that was transferred from Maine owners, and will not bring back one single vessel into Maine. It is only because the question of the navigation laws has been brought into the discussion that I speak of it at all.

I hope, as an indication of the feeling of this House, we will pass the bill simply as an expression of opinion in relation to the conduct of those men who now desire substantial favors at our hands.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] for five minutes.

Mr. BANKS. I have but a word or two to say on this question. I have listened attentively to the arguments of gentlemen upon this bill, and if I thought they were applicable to the subject embraced in the bill, I might be disposed to vote against it. But I believe the purpose of the bill, and the general subject discussed by gentlemen who are opposed to it, are entirely different.

This bill does not propose final legislation. It is provisional; it is temporary; and I think it is entirely just. It says, in substance, that the man who has deserted his country and its flag in the hour of its danger and peril; who has by his desertion forsworn his name as an American; who has escaped the burdens imposed upon his countrymen, and who has avoided the perils that have environed his country in time of war, shall not resume its high privileges now without the authority of law.

That is all that the bill declares. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] on the other side of the House, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] on this side of the House, if they wish these deserters to avail themselves of the privileges of American citizens, are at liberty at any time to introduce a bill prescribing the conditions upon which they shall regain those privileges. Let them do it. Let them define in a legislative act upon what ground and under what circumstances a man who, in the time of his country's danger, has shown himself to be an enemy of that country, shall come back and claim its privileges upon the return of peace.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House is one of so much magnitude that I trust the House will not allow its patriotism to run away with its common sense. It is a subject which should be looked at through a somewhat cooler medium than that of the passions to which appeals are made in connection with it.

I was a little surprised, sir, at a question put by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] when he asked what difference it made whether the merchants of this country transported their merchandise in British, French, or American ships.

Mr. PIKE. What difference in the amount they pay? That was my question.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman confines his inquiry to a difference in the amount of freights, I do not know that it makes any difference.

Mr. PIKE. That was the extent of my inquiry.

Mr. THAYER. But, Mr. Speaker, there is, I suppose, no gentleman upon this floor who will attempt to deny that it is of the first magnitude with regard to the interests of this country that we should have a great and flourishing commercial marine. Where, sir, did you get your Navy during the late war except from the American marine? What would you have done for a Navy if you had not had that marine at your command, and if you had not impressed into the service of the country the ships belonging to American merchants? Nay, more, will any gentleman contend that it is for the advantage of this country that its mercantile interests should depend upon the shipping of a foreign nation, or that the merchants of America should have their interests subjected to the fluctuations and uncertainties of a marine that disappears from the ocean whenever there is a European war, or the agitation of such a war, and reappears only when peaceful times return? Viewing the subject in this light, regarding it as material to the best and highest interests of this country that we should have a great and flourishing mercantile marine, how can any man, upon such grounds as are presented here, vote for such a measure as this, which will expunge so great a proportion of our shipping?

Now, sir, it is said that we should inflict this punishment, not only upon the owners of these vessels, but upon the interests of the country, for an imaginary offense of these ship-owners. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has spoken of the owners of these vessels as "deserters." Sir, I cannot consider them in any such light. I do not know that the citizens of the United States had any interest in having their ships burned upon the high seas by rebel pirates. I do not know what interest of this country would have been subserved by flinging in the way of the enemies of this country the ships of these owners. And if, at any time, when the Government of the United States was unable to protect the shipping of our country, the owners of that shipping chose to resort to a foreign registry for the purpose of preventing the destruction of their property, I see no reason why, not only their interest, but the common interests of the country, which are involved in this question, should be overriden and crushed because of an act of that kind—an act not nefarious in itself. I think that there are higher interests involved than the interests of these owners, and that those higher interests demand that this measure should not become a law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] now yield to me?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Ohio for yielding to me for a few moments, particularly as he took occasion to refer to me personally in his remarks on this bill.

I will, however, allude in the first place to the remark which has just fallen from my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] in regard to the policy of this measure. Let me say to him, and to this House, this bill but carries out the policy of the Government from its earliest foundation; and when the gentleman asks us to consider this question carefully and deliberately, let me refer him to the opinions and recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, which he has sent to this House in answer to a resolution adopted by the House on this very subject. Let me say further, sir, with all modesty, that I believe the Committee on Commerce, which is charged by the House with the consideration of all matters connected with commerce, has some regard for those great interests of the country; and they have reported this bill with a rare degree of unanimity. They believe the interests of the country and the demands of an enlightened patriotism require that we should pass such a measure as this.

The gentleman asks us how we can build up a flourishing marine when we pursue such a course as this. I ask my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania how we can build up a commercial marine when we permit these men in time of war to desert our flag and put their ships under another and a foreign flag? Is that the way to build up and protect a commercial marine, to put a bounty on desertion? Sir, I trust the House will never sanction such a principle.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] spoke of this as a monopoly. I do not look on it in that light. And he wondered why I was on that side, as he rightly understood me to be unalterably opposed to all monopolies and special privileges. He was right. I was opposed to all monopolies of railroads; I was opposed to the monopoly of slavery; I was opposed to "express" monopolies; and, unlike my friend from Ohio, I was in the last Congress opposed to the "whisky monopoly." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury are more important than anything I may say, and I send up his letter to be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 18, 1866.

SIR: By a resolution adopted in the House of Representatives February 23, 1865, I am directed to communicate at the present session facts and information concerning the decrease of our mercantile marine and to suggest such remedial legislation as I may deem expedient. Appended to the resolution is a communication from Mr. Easton, United States consul at Cork, presenting an outline of a plan to encourage and stimulate the building of ships, in which he assumes the loss to our commercial marine in the past five years to be four million tons, the total American tonnage being stated in round numbers at five millions before the late war. It is, however, ascertained by diligent inquiry that shipping to the amount of but 910,466 tons has actually disappeared from our lists from all causes—800,303 transferred to foreign owners, and 110,163 destroyed by pirates, being less than one fifth, instead of four fifths.

In addition to the resolution above mentioned, I have likewise received a copy of another, instructing the Committee on Commerce of the House to inquire into the expediency of so amending the registry laws of the United States as to admit of the registry of any vessel actually owned by a citizen of the United States, without reference to the place of construction. I have the honor, therefore, to submit an expression of my views upon the whole subject.

The existing laws exclude from the privileges of the American flag all foreign-built vessels, and those vessels of domestic build which, after having been once documented under our laws, are transferred to foreign ownership.

This policy of exclusion has been uniformly adhered to since the first establishment of our commercial system, and no general law has at any time prevailed at variance with it, except the act of 2d December, 1852, which permits, under certain conditions, the registry of foreign-built vessels, wrecked in the waters of the United States.

The prohibition, as far as it relates to vessels of foreign build, rests upon the second section of the navigation act of December 31, 1792, and is calculated to cherish and encourage domestic ship-building, which has been regarded vital to our commercial interests, and whatever opinion may be entertained as to the propriety of our eventual relaxation of the stringency of the laws, I do not regard the present as an auspicious moment in which to make the experiment, involving, as it would, so radical a change in the established policy of the Government.

The act of June 27, 1797, forbidding the registry of a vessel built and registered in the United States, but subsequently transferred to a foreigner, rests upon a different but quite as cogent reason, namely, the facility that a privilege of unrestrained transfer would afford for the perpetration of frauds and the evasion of the navigation laws.

During the late war the transfer (in many cases it is believed fictitious or fraudulent) of American bottoms to a foreign flag has been a favorite expedient by which to escape the payment of war rates of insurance, and to avoid the risk of capture. Upward of eight hundred thousand tons of shipping have thus disappeared from our records, for a large portion of which the owners are now claiming readmission when the risks of war are no longer imminent and the privileges of an American registry are again appreciated.

They transferred their vessels with a full knowledge of the sacrifice they incurred, regarding, it must be supposed, the temporary security from losses an equivalent to it, and I should be unwilling to advise in their favor any relaxation of the rigor of the laws.

Neither do I on the other hand recommend any additional encouragement of ship-building by allowance of drawback or otherwise. Enjoying as they do an absolute protection from foreign competition, I cannot conceive that our domestic ship-yards require any further stimulus or more extended privileges.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That shows the reasons which may be so justly urged in favor of what the gentleman calls a "monopoly." I am opposed to all monopolies; and I am opposed to rebels, secessionists, copperheads, or even so-called "loyal men," who deserted the star spangled banner in time of war and sought shelter under the cross of St. George. As they made their bed, so let them sleep.

• Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have only two things to say before I call for the previous question and close the debate.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] said this was a proposition to exclude men who had deserted our flag. I declare the gentleman has not met the point. It is not a law against men; it is a law against tonnage and not men. He may make all the legislation he pleases against letting a disloyal class come back, and I will vote with him. Let him make that discrimination.

He says we propose to change the policy of the Government. My answer is in one word. It is the gentleman himself who is proposing to change the policy of the Government, as the Secretary of the Treasury is every day allowing these vessels to be reregistered. The Committee on Commerce propose to change the law so that he may not allow them to be registered. They propose in this change of the law to keep these vessels out of our merchant marine. We are simply opposing a change of the law in favor of a monopoly.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says if we make free trade on this subject let us make free trade in all. He will not deter me from my purpose by shaking that red rag before me. I do not care what name he calls it; I know it is not free trade; I only know that what he proposes is to discriminate as to all other property and in favor of the property of the shipbuilders. If he will apply the same law to property in ships that he applies to property in all that we own in the great West, then he will find that he cannot maintain his law. All I ask is that the same law shall be applied to both. I call the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered, and there were—yeas 99, nays 52, not voting 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Darling, Dawes, DeForest, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Fougabar, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Donas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClure, McKee, Mercut, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Putno, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—99.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Cook, Cullom, Davis, Denison, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Griswold, Hake, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hayes, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Strouse, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhes, Wentworth, Williams, and Wright—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Blow, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Culver, Dawson, Delano, Dumont, Glosbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Henderson, Higby, Hubbard, Jones, Kasson, Loan, Marston, McIndoe, McKuer, Plants, Radford, Smith, Stevens, Taber, Welker, Whaley, and Winfield—31.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PATTERSON stated that his colleague, Mr. MARSTON, was detained at his room by sickness.

CONTESTED SEAT.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, a motion was adopted last evening by the House referring to the Committee of Elections certain papers in the possession of the Clerk relating to the contested seat in the eighth district of New York. I now desire to submit a motion to reconsider that vote.

Mr. BROOKS. I moved to reconsider the vote last evening; I believe, and it was not entered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that the motion was not made.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish the gentleman from New York would state his reasons for making the motion.

Mr. RAYMOND. I would like to ask the privilege, when the question comes up, for the contestant to be heard. It is according to usage, I believe.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know what object the gentleman has in stopping the publication of these papers. I am unable to see it.

Mr. RAYMOND. The object is to have the question fairly considered, as it was not when the vote was taken. I have no feeling in the matter. I think it is in accordance with usage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] can arrange as to the time when he will call this up. The special order is now before us.

Mr. RAYMOND. The matter may lie over for one, two, or three days, as will suit the convenience of the sitting member.

Mr. BROOKS. I am very much surprised at the motion of my colleague. I am not only surprised, but I am amazed. I cannot understand it.

The SPEAKER. The House is now engaged in the consideration of the special order—the Freedmen's Bureau—on which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has the floor.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to yield to me for the purpose of taking from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 83, and referring it to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The bill was then taken up—it being an act to extend the time for completing certain land grants to the railroads in the States therein mentioned—read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

CONTESTED SEAT—AGAIN.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, how did that come up? I was trying to get the floor, when I understood it to be assigned to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] on the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota yielded the floor to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DAWES. I presume it is all right; but will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] yield me the floor a moment in relation to the matter that has just gone by?

Mr. DONNELLY. I yield.

Mr. DAWES. A motion has been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] to reconsider the vote of the House by which certain papers were referred to the Committee of Elections. I do not know the merits of the case, nor do I desire to interfere in the matter; but he suggested that he desired the motion should lie over for a few days. It is upon that point I wish to be heard. I think, whatever may be the merits of the matter of reference—in regard to the right or wrong of which I have no information—the House ought to indulge the sitting member and the contestant for a few moments before disposing of the question; and if this question is to be put over for several days, it will interrupt the hearing of the case before the committee, and very much derange the business which is crowding that committee, so that they have no time to spare.

I suppose there may be good reasons. I have heard suggestions made of the reasons why the matter should be brought before the House; but I do not know why it could not be disposed of now, if the gentleman from Minnesota will allow the special order to be postponed for a few moments, so as to let the Committee of Elections know whether they are to delay the hearing of the case for the printing of a very large mass of matter. That is all I desire to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the gentleman from Minnesota yields, the House can take up this matter as a question of privilege; but a motion to reconsider can only be called up as a privileged motion when there is no other business before the House. It can be called up to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal, before any other business comes before the House.

Mr. DAWES. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the matter at all. I only desire the House to understand that this proceeding may very much interfere with the business before the Committee of Elections.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire to say that my only object in making this motion was to obtain from the House, if possible, an opportunity for the contestant to be heard, whether heard to-day or to-morrow is a matter of entire indifference to me. I suppose that end can be reached whenever the sitting member and the contestant are prepared to present whatever they desire on the subject.

Mr. DAWES. I submit to the gentleman from New York that the matter had better be delayed.

Mr. DONNELLY. I must decline to yield further.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The House then resumed the consideration of the special order, being Senate bill No. 60, to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, with certain amendments reported in the nature of a substitute from the select committee on the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask the Clerk to read an amendment which I offer to the bill.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "school," in line seven, section six, insert the following:

And the Commissioner may provide a common-school education to all refugees and freedmen who shall apply therefor.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me for a moment to make a statement?

Mr. DONNELLY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ELIOT. It is my intention to call the previous question on the pending motion to-morrow at three o'clock. I say this for the purpose of giving notice to gentlemen on both sides of the House that I propose then to bring the discussion to a close.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know if the gentleman intends to call the previous question without affording an opportunity for amendment? I have one or two amendments which I deem very important, and I am anxious to offer them before the previous question is called.

Mr. BANKS. I desire also to offer an amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. I really cannot answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] now, except so far as to say that I shall be glad to have gentlemen offer their amendments and have them read at such time as it shall be within the rules of the House for them to do so, but I cannot at this time agree to have any amendments to the bill made.

The SPEAKER. The rule allows very limited power of amendment. The only amendment in order now is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, or an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. BANKS. I will read the amendment I desire to offer when the proper time comes. I shall move, if I am permitted to do so, to amend the seventh section of this bill by in-serting after the word "including" the words "the constitutional right to bear arms;" so that it will read, "including the constitutional right to bear arms, the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue," &c.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose it will be in order, if the previous question is not called, to offer a substitute, notwithstanding the pending amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to this whole order of proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct in his point of order. This discussion is not explanatory of the pending measure.

Mr. BROOKS. As a free white man, I desire at least an equal chance with the black man to be heard.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the bill to which I offer this as an amendment is one of those great and necessary measures growing inevitably out of the rebellion. Having made the slave a freedman, the nation needs some instrumentality which shall reach to every portion of the South and stand between the freedman and oppression.

I have proposed the amendment which has been read at the Clerk's desk to increase the powers thus granted; so that this bureau, while it protects and directs the negro, may educate him, and fit him to protect and direct himself in that not distant day when the bureau must necessarily be withdrawn.

In this connection I propose to submit to the House a few general remarks, touching, however, the bill under consideration.

It is a subject of congratulation that we have passed beyond those old and bitter days when revenge and intolerance were the guiding principles of Governments. As victors in the mighty struggle which has but lately terminated, and as the superiors of the South in enlightenment and Christianity, we can afford to be magnanimous to the greatest degree compatible with public safety. That alone should be the limit of our generosity, and beyond that we should not go a hair's breadth.

We must cultivate an enlarged national spirit. We are and must always be one people. We cannot advance the nation by despoiling any part of it. We cannot strengthen liberty here by inaugurating oppression elsewhere. We must hasten that day when we will be in mutual regard, as we are in name, one people.

We must do all things necessary for the welfare of the South, as well those things which she desires as those which she does not desire.

But we must be the judges of that which is for her welfare. We have no right to assume that she was wrong in her rebellion, and right in all the causes that led to it, and all the consequences that flowed from it.

The southern insurrection was but the armed expression of certain popular convictions, which in their turn arose from peculiar social conditions. The disease was radical and the remedy must be not less so. We must lay the ax to the root of the tree. We must legislate against the cause, not the consequences; otherwise we become the mere repressers of disturbances, not a wise and provident Government; we play the part of the executioner, not the law-maker.

Having prohibited slavery, we must not pause for an instant until the spirit of slavery is extinct, and every trace left by it in our laws is obliterated.

The spirit of humanity cannot be illiberal. Reform cannot work injustice. The right wrongs no man. In all this we shall bless and benefit the South and lift her up to a higher plane of prosperity and greatness. It will be a work of mercy. To do otherwise would be to leave her a prey to that misgovernment which has already blasted her fair fields and filled her habitations with mourning.

Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that in the solution of this question we approach the great test, I may say the crucial test, of our institutions and of the popular judgment.

This is our time of opportunity.

The whole South overthrown, disrupted, disorganized, lies at our feet; it is for us as victors to prescribe the terms. If we fail to take advantage of the occasion which an unexampled war and unexampled success have given us, it is impossible to estimate the evils that will follow. We may almost repeat the melancholy prophecy of Henry Winter Davis: "a failure now will be final for our generation."

Our great danger is indifference.

In the exultation of success many imagine that our country has swept past all peril. It is not given us to know the dangers that await us. Who could have foreseen the terrible war in which we have been engaged? Who can anticipate the quarter from which the next blow will descend? It should never be forgotten that nearly all the nations of the world are arrayed against us; and that the enemies of liberal principles are numerous and active everywhere. While we may not fall upon that "universal war of opinion" foretold by Mr. Seward, nevertheless we must expect many open and not a few insidious attacks upon our life. Be assured of this, that if by neglect we leave the avenues that lead to the national heart unguarded they will swarm with our enemies.

Indifference calls to its aid all the specious arguments of hope.

We are told that time and change of circumstances will cure all the evils of the South.

Sir, I grant you that if the mind of the North asserts its majestic sway in the South, and if this measure and kindred measures demanded by the majority in Congress are passed and enforced, we have much to hope for. But if we permitted the reënslavement of the freedman or his reduction to a condition of peonage, the case would be far different. The indignation of the world would once more isolate the South; and they would meet that indignation as they met it in the old days of slavery, with dark and defiant brows. Instead of being absorbed in the conquering population, like the Scotch or the Welsh, they would remain, like the Irish or the Poles, a distinct people. They would possess a public sentiment, a history, a literature of their own. Their representative form of government would intensify that public sentiment. The battles of the rebellion would be fought over and over again upon this floor; crimination and recrimination would be the burden of every debate; and the bitter feelings of both sections would be maintained at white heat by the appeals of passionate leaders. Nor would this be all. The children of these people would be educated to reverence the leaders of the rebellion, and to place Lee beside Washington in the niches of their hearts. Time will afford us no relief. A new generation is not a new people. The Irishman of to-day hates England with as intense a hatred as the Irishman who fought against Elizabeth.

He must indeed be of a sanguine temper who can see in such a future anything but violence and disaster.

But we are told immigration will cure all this.

Immigration moves only in the direction of prosperity. The amount of immigration to a country is a fair indication of the number of advantages it enjoys. If you hand the South over to themselves; if you permit the oppression of the freedman; if you permit the reëstablishment of slavery under a new name, you will shut off immigration as effectually as it was shut off in the old days of slavery. The northern man would not be welcome there. The European would not go there to labor in competition with a wretched and degraded race.

If by wise laws you make the South prosperous and happy, then you may expect immigration to pour in from every quarter. If by neglect you leave her misgoverned and miserable, she will hold out no more temptation to the emigrant than Mexico now does.

But we are told we must not pass such laws as this; we must not intrude upon the South; we must "trust the South." All that she asks, we are told, is that we will leave the negro to her to manage.

Mr. Speaker, we have trusted the South since the formation of the Government.

The framers of the Constitution trusted that slavery would speedily perish from the land. To this end they interdicted the slave trade and the extension of slavery to the northwestern Territories. What has been the result? From a quarter of a million the slaves increased to four millions; from a weak and helpless evil, slavery grew into a powerful, warlike, and aggressive system. The life of the nation well-nigh paid the forfeit for this first great error.

But still we trusted her. We trusted she would never seek to possess herself of the whole of our Territories. The Dred Scott decision was her answer.

We trusted on. We believed she would never attempt to destroy the life of the nation. The confederacy was the reply.

Even then we trusted her. We believed it was but a feint, an electioneering trick, and that she could not mean to destroy the life of the nation. The guns that thundered against Fort Sumter dispelled that delusion.

But even yet the sublime faith of many did not desert them. They hoped against hope. For two long years the war was conducted under the belief that the South would yet return willingly to the Union. Who can count the heaps of slain, the piles of treasure, the lost opportunities that terrible error cost us?

But, sir, faith was not even yet dead. In the year 1864 a great party met in convention in Chicago and resolved to "trust the South." Our armies were to be recalled and disbanded, all violent measures were to be given up, and we were to throw ourselves upon the compassionating bosom of the South and trust to her to reestablish the Union.

It were time this fantasy were dead.

"The times have been,
That when the brains were out the man would die;
And there an end; but now they rise again,
With twenty mortal murders on their crowns,
And push us from our stools."

But it is not dead. The war has triumphed; the South is prostrate; the safety of the country, the public faith, the plainest dictates of common sense and common humanity all demand that we shall inaugurate sweeping measures of reform, and regenerate and rejuvenate the South; but in the very moment when we are moving on to the performance of our grand duty we are again met in the face by the same clamor, "We must trust the South."

Sir, I am ready to trust the South when we have reformed the South, and not till then. The South that made the rebellion, in the same temper in which she made it, I never will trust.

We did not trust the suppression of the rebellion to the operations of time or immigration. We cannot trust the eradication of the causes of the rebellion to any such agencies. As we relied in the one case upon the strong arms and sharp weapons of our soldiery, so in the other we must rely upon the clear perception and the resolute determination of our statesmen.

Away with all such false and delusive hopes! They are the snare of the weak and the argument of the crafty. Tyranny has no more formidable weapons in all its armory.

Are we to believe that posterity will possess more courage, more judgment, more virtue than ourselves after we have embarrassed them with the results of our own cowardice and imbecility? Is it to be believed that the pure, sweet waters of good government can flow from the impure fountains of legislative neglect?

This is our opportunity. We must avail ourselves of it. We cannot shuffle off this coil upon the shoulders of posterity. The world will judge us by the completeness and thoroughness of our work.

Shall nothing be born of this mighty convulsion, mightier by far than the old Revolution, mightier than all the revolutions of the world? Will the timidity of men halt far behind the prodigious strides of events? Shall the earth be shaken to its very center and not a single idol in the old temple be thrown to the ground?

Sir, this is a new birth of the nation. The Constitution will hereafter be read by the light of the rebellion; by the light of the emancipation; by the light of that tremendous uprising of the intellect of the world going on everywhere around us. He is indeed fearfully cramped by the old technicalities who can see in this enormous struggle only the suppression of a riot and the dispersion of a mob. This struggle has been as organic in its great meanings as the Constitution itself. It will leave its traces upon our Government and laws so long as the nation continues to exist.

There are certain measures upon which the dominant party seem agreed. They are:

1. The amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the payment of any debt contracted in furtherance of the rebellion.

2. The amendment to confine the basis of representation to those actually represented in Congress.

3. The passage of the bill now under consideration, enlarging the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

The first two practically amount to little. The rebellion having failed, it followed that those who furnished means to it should lose them. Slavery having perished, it became a necessary consequence that any inequality of representation originating out of slavery should perish with it.

Are we to stop here? Are the labors of the mountain to produce only this?

Certainly not. There is an amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] which provides in effect that Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation all the guarantees of the Constitution.

Why should this not pass? Are the promises of the Constitution mere verbiage? Are its sacred pledges of life, liberty, and property to fall to the ground through lack of power to enforce them? Shall the old reign of terror revive in the South, when no northern man's life was worth an hour's purchase? Or shall that great Constitution be what its founders meant it to be, a shield and a protection over the head of the lowliest and poorest citizen in the remotest region of the nation?

No argument can resist such a measure. If you will not enforce your guarantees strike them out. Let them not stand upon the front of the temple empty lies and deceitful cheats. Let it be at once understood that there is no national protection in our land for life, liberty, or property, and let the law of "the good right hand" at once prevail.

The third measure, that under consideration, should not awaken opposition. It is right and necessary. So long as oppression continues the Government must intervene in behalf of justice and liberty, and through what machinery can it better intervene than through this bureau?

But, sir, even more than all this is needed. What, let me ask, is the condition of the mind of the South?

A distinguished gentleman on this floor has said that in the last analysis the sovereignty of the country is the ballot. This it is that makes Congresses, Presidents, laws, and policies. But there is something behind even this. There is the judgment of the citizen to direct the ballot. Hence the ballot itself, laws, policies, Congresses, and Presidents are but the formal expressions of that judgment; and as that judgment is, so will be the nation. The best laws will not save an unworthy people from ruin, as is seen in the case of the South American republics. The worst forms of government will not prevent a clear-headed race from struggling up to prosperity, as is seen in the history of England. You may have as many constitutions, and as perfect as the fertile Sieyès kept in the pigeon-holes of his desk, but they will prove of no avail if the people are not fit to receive them. Gentlemen demand that the ballot shall be universal. They must go further; they must insist that capacity to properly direct the ballot shall be likewise universal.

Said Washington:

"In proportion as the structure of government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened."

Said Jefferson, in the famous Ordinance of 1787:

"Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever established."

Says Horace Mann:

"If republican institutions do waken up unexampled energies in the whole mass of the people, and give them implements of unexampled power wherewith to work out their will, then these same institutions ought also to confer upon that people unexampled wisdom and rectitude." "I know we are often admonished that without intelligence and virtue as a chart and a compass to direct us in our untried political voyage we shall perish in the first storm; but I venture to add, that without these qualities we shall not wait for a storm—we cannot weather a calm. If the sea is as smooth as glass, we shall founder, for we are in a stone boat."

Let us inquire, what is education?

It is a means to an end—the intelligent action of the human faculties. He who is opposed to education is opposed to the enlightenment of the people, and must necessarily be their enemy, since he seeks to himself some advantage out of their ignorance, and strives to obscure their judgment that he may the better mislead them.

It is not necessary to demonstrate the importance of education. The common sense of mankind approves it; the success of our nation attests it; a million happy homes in our midst proclaim it. Education has here fused all nations into one; it has obliterated prejudices; it has dissolved falsehoods; it has announced great truths; it has flung open all doors; and thank God, it has at last broken all the shackles in the land! The rebellion sprang from popular ignorance; its suppression came from popular education. When the Englishman described the North as a land "where every man had a newspaper in his pocket," he touched at once the vital point of our greatness and the true secret of our success.

Let the great work go on. Its tasks are but half completed. Let it go on until ignorance is driven beyond our remotest borders. This is the noblest of all human labors. This will build deep and wide and imperishable the foundations of our Government; this will raise up a structure that shall withstand the slow canker of time and the open assaults of violence. The freedom of the people resting upon the intelligence of the people! Who shall destroy a nation founded on this rock?

The one great error of our country has been that education was not from the very first made a matter of the State, and as essential to the citizen as liberty itself. Education means the intelligent exercise of liberty, and surely without this liberty is a calamity, since it means simply the unlimited right to err. Who can doubt that if a man is to govern himself he should have the means to know what is best for himself, what is injurious to himself, what agencies work against him and what for him? And the avenue to all this is simply education. Suffrage without education is an edged tool in the hands of a child—dangerous to others and destructive to himself.

Now, what is the condition of the South in reference to all this?

I assert that it is such as would bring disgrace upon any despotism in Christendom.

The great bulk of the people are rude, illiterate, semi-civilized; hence the rebellion; hence all the atrocious barbarities that accompanied it.

The number of ignorant is indicated by the proportion unable to read and write; indicated, I say, but not fully shown, because, of the practically ignorant, of those who read neither books nor newspapers, and are thus cut off from acquiring information through its ordinary channels; the proportion who have never learned their letters or to write their names may be small indeed.

I repeat, the condition of the South in this respect would be shameful to any semi-civilized people, and is such as to render a republican Government, resting on the intelligent judgment of the people, an impossibility.

I appeal to the revelations of the census. My statistics do not include the former slaves, but the white people of the South and the few freed negroes found among them in 1860.

In the first place I would quote the following very complete table, furnished me by the Census Bureau, and giving the total results upon this subject for the whole United States:

Persons over twenty years of age unable to read and write, eighth census, 1860.

It appears from this table that the adult male white and free negro population of the United States, in 1860, over twenty years of age, who could not read and write was but little short of half a million. In other words, that in the last presidential election, if the entire population of the United States had voted, half a million votes would have been cast by men who could not read and write.

When we recollect that upon our presidential elections depend the great interests and the life of the country, and remotely the cause of all mankind, we may well stand appalled before this vast force of half a million ignorant men deciding the destinies of the world.

But if we look exclusively at the southern States we find still greater cause for surprise and alarm.

The following table shows the number of illiterate male whites in seven southern States; also the total vote of those States in 1860, and the vote given in each State in the same year for Breckinridge:

STATES.	No. of illiterate males over 20 years.	Total vote in 1860.	Vote for Breckinridge, 1860.
Delaware.....	2,838	16,039	7,337
Virginia.....	31,178	167,223	74,323
North Carolina.....	26,024	96,230	48,539
Tennessee.....	27,358	145,333	64,709
Alabama.....	14,517	90,357	48,831
Arkansas.....	9,379	54,053	28,732
Kentucky.....	28,742	146,216	53,143
Total.....	140,036	715,551	325,614

If we examine this table, we find that in the seven States named the number of illiterate is about one fifth the total number of voters, and nearly one half the total vote for Breckinridge, the representative of disunion and secession.

If, however, we add to each man entirely illiterate one other who, while able to read and write his name, derives no practical advantage from these mere rudiments of education in forming his opinions, we will find the total to be more than one third of the total vote and five sixths of the vote for Breckinridge.

The total number of illiterate in the southern States in 1860, over twenty years of age, exclusive of the then slaves, was 545,177. In these, with the comparatively ignorant associated with them, we see the upholders of the rebellion at the ballot-box and in the field. Without these it could never have been inaugurated, or if inaugurated could never have maintained itself for six months against the mighty levies of the Union.

But, it may be said, these evils will correct themselves. The testimony is all the other way:

From 1840 to 1860, a period of twenty years, the number of illiterate over twenty years rose from 549,693 to 1,218,311; in other words, an increase of considerably more than one hundred per cent.!

At the same ratio of growth it would be 2,674,472 in 1880; 5,823,700 in 1900; and in 1920 it would amount to the enormous total of 12,596,688.

In other words, in fifty years from the taking of the next census, the illiterate in the United States over twenty years, exclusive of the freedmen, will be 12,500,000, four times the number with which the nation commenced its career, nearly one half the total white population in 1860, and representing a voting force one third greater than the total vote at the presidential election in 1860; that is to say, over 6,000,000 voters!

Who will pretend that with such a mass of ignorance the Government could survive? It would be buried in the most disgraceful anarchy the world has ever seen.

But, Mr. Speaker, even these appalling figures do not tell the whole story. These figures do not include the then slaves, now freedmen. We must add to the ignorant population of the South the 4,000,000 blacks just released from slavery.

The figures would stand as follows:

Year.	NUMBER OF ILLITERATE.
	White.	Black.	Total.
1880.....	2,674,472	3,309,175	5,983,647
1900.....	5,823,700	4,765,212	10,588,912
1920.....	12,596,688	5,994,812	18,591,500

So that in fifty years from the next census, a very short period in the life of a nation, when it is supposed that the total population will be 120,000,000, the illiterate will be one fifth of the entire number and nearly one third of the entire vote.

I trust, then, that no gentleman will doubt the propriety of the amendment I have submitted. We are interfering in behalf of the negro; let us interfere to educate him. We thus strike out at one blow a large proportion of the ignorance of the South; we shame the whites into an effort to educate themselves, and we prepare thus both classes for the proper exercise of the right of suffrage.

Nor shall it be said that the ignorance revealed by these statistics is an exotic, that it results from foreign immigration. While it is true that in the North a large proportion of the illiterate are from foreign lands, in the South the reverse is the case. In North Carolina, in 1860, the illiterate persons of native birth were 74,877, while those of foreign birth were but 100. In Alabama the illiterate of native birth were 37,302, while those of foreign birth were 2,668.

The total number of illiterate foreigners in the United States in 1860 was 342,917; while, I am sorry to say, those born under our institutions, and unable at the age of twenty years to read and write, were 834,106.

Let us however, set aside the foreign infusion altogether, and divide the illiterate according to the natural divisions of the country.

The results are as follows:

Section.	No. of illiterate of native birth.	Total population.
New England States.....	8,543	3,135,283
Middle States.....	93,533	7,571,101
Southern States.....	545,177	12,128,078
Western States (Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Kansas).....	146,321	5,509,096
Northwestern States (Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin).....	24,791	2,371,930
Pacific States.....	12,709	432,459

A comparison of these figures leads to some surprising results. If, for instance, the ratio of the New England States held good, we should have less than 80,000 native-born illiterate persons in the United States instead of the 834,000 we now have. In other words, the illiterate native voters of the country would be less than 40,000, instead of being over 400,000!

On the other hand, we find that the southern States have a population about equal to the middle and western States combined, while the number of illiterate in the former is 545,177, as against 241,854 in the latter; and this not including the vast number of illiterate freedmen in the South, who would make the disproportion still greater. So that the South outnumbered in illiterate the most unfavorable portions of the North more than two to one.

As compared with the New England States the disproportion is still more striking. At the ratio of New England the southern States should have but 34,000 illiterate persons; as it is the number is 545,177.

The whole United States, with a population of 27,000,000, contains 834,106 illiterate persons, and of these 545,177 are found in the southern States with a population of 12,000,000. In other words, the entire populous North contains but 288,923, while the sparsely settled South contains 545,177.

Who can fail to see in this vast disproportion the cause of the rebellion? In the language of Henry Ward Beecher:

"As upon the coast you can trace the line between the dark and treacherous sea on the one hand, and the firm and trusty land on the other, by the row of light-houses; so you can mark between the deep, damnable wickedness of treason and the supernal luster of patriotism by the line of school-houses."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I put it to this House, and through it to the whole people of the country, North and South, whether this state of things is to continue. This is not a political question. It rises above the level of politics and directly affects the welfare of all the people and the life of the nation itself.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire to ask the gentleman if, notwithstanding all that ignorance, he wants to add to it by allowing the colored population to vote.

Mr. DONNELLY. In answer to that I will say that I have offered an amendment which provides that it shall be the principal duty of the Freedmen's Bureau to educate that negro population and so fit them eventually for the right of suffrage. And the amendment at the same time leaves the door open for white refugees. So that while I am stating an evil I am proposing a remedy.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Is the gentleman in favor of allowing the right of suffrage to the colored people in the southern States at this time?

Mr. DONNELLY. When that question comes up for action I shall be prepared to express an opinion. In the mean time I will say that I am prepared to follow the course indicated by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in his remarks on yesterday, that we must first prepare and fit the people of the South for the right of suffrage by the education of the mind of the South.

Now, having answered the question of the gentleman in reference to that portion of our population that throughout the wars sympathized with the cause of the Union, I will ask him a question. Is he prepared to extend the right of suffrage to that portion of the population that constantly fought against the Union and sought to destroy it, and who, as I have shown by these statistics, are, the great bulk of them, equally ignorant with the blacks? I would like an answer from the gentleman.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I was engaged in conversation when the gentleman asked his question. Will he propound it again?

Mr. DONNELLY. I have answered the gentleman in regard to giving the right of voting to the black population who sustained the cause of the Union with their sympathy, with material aid, and to the number of nearly two hundred thousand by arms, but who, I admit, are ignorant. I now ask the gentleman if he is willing that the equally ignorant white population of the South who were opposed to the Union shall be invested at once with the right of suffrage?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I am in favor of allowing those to vote who have been engaged in the rebellion against the Government, provided they have been pardoned by the Executive and are now for the Government.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would ask the gentleman, as a question of principle, whether an executive pardon is able to change the minds and hearts of men? Whether a rebel with a pardon in his pocket is not just as rank a rebel as before he received it?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I would ask the gentleman whether he has ever done anything more than make speeches to put down the rebellion?

Mr. DONNELLY. I will answer that question by saying that when this great civil war was in its full strength, and the great political issue was whether this Union should be maintained by the reelection of Abraham Lincoln to the presidential chair, I did yeoman service to secure that result; which, more than anything else, more than armies or battles, tended to crush out the rebellion, by proving distinctly to the South that the cause of the South was forever hopeless. I hold that the man who fought copperheads is entitled to as much credit as the man who fought rebels.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he sustains the policy of Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson.

Mr. DONNELLY. I do adhere to the policy of Abraham Lincoln, as I understand it, and of Andrew Johnson as I approve it.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. How much of Andrew Johnson's policy does the gentleman approve?

Mr. DONNELLY. So much as tends to the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the liberty and equal rights of every man living under the shadow of our flag.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I ask the gentleman whether he does not approve of Andrew Johnson's policy so far as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] approves of it.

Mr. DONNELLY. I approve of Andrew Johnson's policy as enunciated in his speech at Nashville, in which he told the black men that if they had no other Moses he would be their Moses. [Applause.] I ask the gentleman whether he approves that portion of Andrew Johnson's policy.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. If any man wants to be a Moses in behalf of the colored race, I am in favor of his assuming that character.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will ask whether the gentleman wants Andrew Johnson to be such a Moses?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Certainly, when it is necessary. Will that gratify the gentleman?

Mr. DONNELLY. It will gratify me and the country too.

But, to proceed with the remarks I was making when interrupted. If, sir, this enormous growth of ignorance is to continue we can meet with no fate save that which has overtaken too many of the free Governments of the world.

We cannot count upon our representative system. The struggle we have gone through shows too plainly that reforms must originate with the people. The people may be converted, the representatives never. They are precisely what the people behind them are, and no more. If the people are ignorant, they will have demagogues for their representatives.

The preservation of this Government through the many dangers that have encompassed it since its birth I look upon as the marvel of modern times. The hand of God is plainly visible in it. Let us do our part now to prepare the way for the mighty future that awaits us. There is no loftier task on earth.

We cannot leave the population of the South, white or black, in the condition they are now in. We must educate them. When you destroy ignorance you destroy disloyalty; for what man with a free, broad scope of mind, and with a knowledge of all the facts, can fail to love this just, benevolent, and most gentle Government?

Let us turn, then, to the next consideration. What chance is there for the black man in the South without the intervention of this bureau?

We have liberated four million slaves in the South.

It is proposed by some that we stop right here and do nothing more. Such a course would be a cruel mockery.

These men are without education, and morally and intellectually degraded by centuries of bondage. They have neither the arts nor the knowledge nor the power of combination to protect themselves against the superior race from whose grasp they have just been forcibly wrested. That race did not willingly yield them up; to abandon them to their former masters would be to consign them once more to inevitable slavery. The master would have every inducement to reenslave his former bondsman, and not a single barrier would stand in his way.

But it may be said the amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery would protect them. Sir, a grand abstract declaration, unenforced by the arm of authority, is not a protection.

But gentlemen seem to forget that slavery is not confined to any precise condition. Every country tolerating slavery has affixed to it conditions peculiar to itself. The old Roman slavery was in many essentials different from the southern institution; and modern slavery has presented many different phases.

Slavery consists in a deprivation of natural rights. A man may be a slave for a term of years as fully as though he were held for life; he may be a slave when deprived of a portion of the wages of his labor as fully as if deprived of all; he may be held down by unjust laws to a degraded and defenseless condition as fully as though his wrists were manacled; he may be oppressed by a convocation of masters called a Legislature as fully as by a single master. In short, he who is not entirely free is necessarily a slave.

What has the South done for the black man since the close of the rebellion?

Let us examine the black codes of the different States adopted since that time.

In South Carolina it is provided that all male negroes between two and twenty, and all females between two and eighteen, shall be bound out to some "master." The adult negro is compelled to enter into contract with a master, and the district judge, not the laborer, is to fix the value of the labor. If he thinks the compensation too small and will not work, he is a vagrant, and can be hired out for a term of service at a rate again to be fixed by the judge. If a hired negro leaves his employer he forfeits his wages for the whole year.

The black code of Mississippi provides that no negro shall own or hire lands in the State; that he shall not sue nor testify in court against a white man; that he must be employed by a master before the second Monday in January, or he will be bound out—in other words, sold into slavery; that if he runs away the master may recover him and deduct the expenses out of his wages; and that if another man employs him he will be liable to an action for damages. It is true the President has directed General Thomas to disregard this code; but the moment the military force is withdrawn from the State that order will be of no effect.

The black code of Alabama provides that if a negro who has contracted to labor fails to do so he shall be punished with damages; and if he runs away he shall be punished as a vagrant, which probably means that he shall be sold to the highest bidder for a term of years; and that any person who entices him to leave his master, as by the offer of better wages, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be sent to jail for six months; and further, that these regulations include all persons of negro blood to the third generation, though one parent in each generation shall be pure white; that is, down to the man who has but one-eighth negro blood in his veins.

The Mississippi Legislature passed a law prohibiting negroes from acquiring lands or real estate. This was promptly overruled by the United States authorities. Whereupon the Legislatures of Mississippi and Alabama passed laws making the owner of the property, who rents or leases a negro a house or land, responsible for everything he buys—his meat, his bread, his doctor's bill, and even his taxes. Of course no one will rent a black man a house or lease him land under such a law; and of course also the negro will have to be driven out upon the highway and become a vagrant, and thus become subject to the vagrant law.

The black code of Tennessee provides that the vagrant negro may be sold to the highest bidder to pay his jail fees; and to make sure that he be kept a vagrant no housekeeper shall harbor him; his children may be bound out against his wish to a master by the county court; if his master fails to pay him he cannot sue him nor testify against him. It further provides that colored children shall not be admitted into the same schools with white children, while it makes no provision for their education in separate schools.

The black code of Virginia provides that any man who will not work for "the common wages given to other laborers" shall be deemed a vagrant; the masters have formed combinations and have put down the rate of wages to the freedmen below a living price; the negro refusing to work for these wages is seized as a vagrant, sold to service "for the best wages that can be procured" for three months; if he runs off he shall work another month with ball and chain for nothing.

It is true General Terry has declared that the order shall not be enforced; but of what avail will this be when the military are withdrawn and Virginia is reconstructed?

All this means simply the reestablishment of slavery:

1. He shall work at a rate of wages to be fixed by a county judge or a Legislature made up of white masters, or by combinations of white masters, and not in any case by himself.
2. He shall not leave that master to enter service with another. If he does he is pursued as a fugitive, charged with the expenses of his recapture, and made to labor for an additional period, while the white man who induced him to leave is sent to jail.
3. His children are taken from him and sold into virtual slavery.
4. If he refuses to work he is sold to the highest bidder for a term of months or years, and becomes in fact a slave.
5. He cannot better his condition; there is no future for him; he shall not own property; he shall not superintend the education of his children; neither will the State educate them.
6. If he is wronged he has no remedy, for the courts are closed against him.

Said a Georgian the other day:

"The blacks eat, sleep, move, live, only by the tolerance of the whites, who hate them. The blacks own absolutely nothing but their bodies; their former masters own everything, and will sell them nothing. If a black man draws even a bucket of water from a well, he must first get the permission of a white man, his enemy. If he sleeps in a house over night, it is only by the leave of a white man. If he buys a loaf of bread, he must buy of a white man. If he asks for work to earn his living, he must ask it of a white man; and the whites are determined to give him no work, except on such terms as will make him a serf and impair his liberty."

This, then, is slavery, less the protection which the master formerly afforded his chattel. The slave now has a mob for his master. General Schurz says, in his admirable report:

"The emancipation of the slaves is submitted to only in so far as chattel slavery in the old form could not be kept up. But although the freedman is no longer considered the property of the individual master, he is considered the slave of society; and all independent State legislation will show the tendency to make him such. The ordinances abolishing slavery, passed by the conventions under the pressure of circumstances, will not be looked upon as barring the establishment of a new form of servitude."

The enemies of the black man, those who opposed his liberation, now point to him and say, "See the condition to which you have reduced him. He is worse off than before. His race is perishing from the face of the earth under the innumerable miseries which liberty has inflicted upon it."

For once, with the help of Almighty God, I shall never consent to such cruel injustice. Having voted to give the negro liberty, I shall vote to give him all things essential to liberty.

If degradation and oppression have, as it is alleged, unfitted him for freedom, surely continued degradation and oppression will not prepare him for it. If he is not to remain a brute you must give him that which will make him a man—opportunity. If he is, as it is claimed, an inferior being and unable to compete with the white man on terms of equality, surely you will not add to the injustice of nature by casting him beneath the feet of the white man. With what face can you reproach him with his degradation at the very moment you are striving to still further degrade him? If he is, as you say, not fit to vote, give him a chance; let him make himself an independent laborer like yourself; let him own his homestead; let the courts of justice be opened to him; and let his intellect, darkened by centuries of neglect, be illuminated by all the glorious lights of education. If after all this he proves himself an unworthy savage and brutal wretch, condemn him, but not till then.

He must have this opportunity. He cannot remain in an amphibious condition between liberty and slavery. He must be either full slave or full freeman; he must either be master of himself or the servant of another.

Do not believe the delusive hope uttered by some that the race which has all the privileges will some day willingly divide them with the race that has none. The world's history tells us no such story. The Old World's royalties and aristocracies rest upon ancient conquests; and yet how unwilling, even after centuries have passed, have the victors ever been to permit the vanquished to rise! Let the wretched condition of the masses in those countries at the present day testify.

Is the right of suffrage necessary to the negro?

The right to vote is the right of self-protection, through the possession of a share in the Government. Without this a man's rights lie at the mercy of other men who have every selfish incentive to rob and oppress him. This is the great central idea of a republican Government. The absence of this is the source of all despotism. I would ask, what white man would consider himself safe without the right to vote, especially if the Government was exercised exclusively by a hostile race?

What shield and safeguard can the negro have if it be not the right to vote? To whom can he appeal when the highest earthly tribunals are filled by his enemies?

No man can rest with safety upon the mercy and generosity of any other man. The law protects the ward from its guardian, the child from its parent, the wife from her husband, nay, even the dumb brute from its owner. Can we then, as the Representatives of a free people, consign a helpless race to the mercy of its hereditary oppressors? Can we, in the heart of a free Government, permit the erection of such a strange and abnormal system of despotism? [Here the Speaker's hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended so as to enable him to conclude his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. DONNELLY. I thank the House for the courtesy it has extended to me.

Mr. Speaker, it is as plain to my mind as the sun at noonday, that we must make all the citizens of the country equal before the law; that we must break down all walls of caste; that we must offer equal opportunities to all men.

Injustice is the mother of revolutions. In no case has rebellion raised its head in the midst of equal laws; for what more can a man ask than equality? But I challenge the historian to point to a single community where unjust laws have not sooner or later given birth to revolutions; to the efforts of one class to perpetuate and of the other to resist injustice.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question? He has just said that rebellion or revolution never takes place where equal laws exist. What does he think of the late rebellion in that view of the matter?

Mr. DONNELLY. My answer to that is afforded by the very expression which I have just used, that, where unjust laws exist, rebellion is the result of the efforts of one class to perpetuate and of the other to resist injustice. Sir, it was the unjust laws of the South, it was the oppression of the blacks by the whites, that led to the late rebellion. If there had been no slavery there could have been no rebellion.

If you give the negro an equal opportunity with the white man, he becomes perforce a property-holder and a law-maker, and he is interested with you in preserving the peace of the country. If you hand him over to oppression, if you deprive him of all hope, if you debase him into a brute, you can expect nothing from him but poverty, turbulence, and wretchedness. If then your object, if the object of all government, is to advance the prosperity of the people, can you do so by ruining one eighth of the entire population?

The true issue before the South is justice or anarchy. We must save the South from herself. The negroes now know themselves to be freemen. They may be made savages, but never again slaves. The cruel, heartless course the South seems bent on pursuing will sooner or later set the land aflame with insurrection. And in that day are we ready, we, the Christian people of the North, to hold down with our armies the poor writhing wretches who will tell us that their title deeds of liberty bear our superscription; and who will fling into our faces while we are manacled them the sacred promises of the proclamation of emancipation? Never! never! This thing cannot be. Our own hearts would revolt at it; the world would cry us Shame! The name of American would become an epithet of contempt in the mouth of all mankind.

We must hold our faith. We made great vows to God when the fury of the tempest smote us, and night and darkness seemed settling down upon our frail bark forever. Let us not, like the drunken sailors of the Mediterranean, abandon those vows amid the profligacy of the harbor. It becomes a great people to hold its faith as the most sacred thing beneath the wide canopy of the heavens.

If it is, then, true that we must make the freedmen fully free, and if the right of suffrage is necessary to this freedom, then it is equally necessary that education should accompany freedom.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he favored negro suffrage and voted for it at the last election in his State.

Mr. DONNELLY. I am proud to say that I not only voted for it, but that I drew the resolution which was passed by the Republican State convention of Minnesota, indorsing that doctrine; and that I canvassed two thirds of the territory of that State in behalf of it, and, thank God, I am ready to do so again to-morrow.

Pass the amendment I have proposed, and the Freedman's Bureau will not only protect the negro now but give him the means of self-protection hereafter. Without this the ballot is a useless, perhaps a pernicious, instrument in his hands. Without this your bureau will be but a temporary relief, and in a short time the negro will relapse into oppression. Educate him, and he will himself see to it that common schools shall forever continue among his people; and in doing him an act of justice you will increase the safety of the nation forever.

Let not the objection of expense be made. No outlay is too great which is necessary to the safety of the people, since in that is involved all the wealth of the country. It is a madman's economy to save money by rendering the people unfit for self-government and then lose all in the misgovernment which is sure to follow.

Universal education must go hand in hand with universal suffrage. Either alone will be unavailing; together they will create the mightiest Government and the ablest race the world has ever known.

If you pass the amendment I have offered, the Freedman's Bureau becomes an instrumentality of more good than was ever before achieved in the world by any merely human agency. Its influence will be greater than even Jefferson's famous ordinance, which gave to freedom the Northwestern Territory. And who shall count the results yet to flow from that great measure? A thoroughly educated negro population in the South means a white population forced into education through mere shame; it means an intelligent, and necessarily, a loyal people; it means industry, prosperity, morality, and religion everywhere; a land rejoicing in wealth and glorious with liberty.

Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot refuse the request of the future Governor of the State of Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

MANUFACTURES OF PITTSBURG.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to lay before the House a letter from the Board of Trade of Pittsburgh, correcting an error which has been made in an official statement of the Secretary of the Interior in reference to the manufactures of that city. I will not ask that the paper be read, as it might detain the House too long, but I desire that it shall be printed, and also that it be published in the Globe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES in the chair.) If there be no objection the communication will be received and that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

ROOMS OF THE BOARD OF TRADE OF PITTSBURG.
PITTSBURG, January 27, 1866.

SIR: A statement made officially to the House of Representatives of the manufacturing production of the principal cities of the United States announces to the world that Pittsburgh, proud of the cognomen of the Birmingham of America, has been sailing under false colors, and is, on high authority, pronounced an inconsiderable manufacturing town, of less productive capacity than Richmond, Virginia.

In that statement the manufacturing product of Pittsburgh is given at $11,000,000 annually. Feeling that it is of vital importance to Pittsburgh that Congress should be disabused of impressions so incorrect, I hasten to present you some facts, which should if possible be formally read to the House of Representatives in correction of the statement they have received.

The community of Pittsburgh, although divided into several municipalities under diverse police regulations and officials, is a compact mass of over one hundred and fifty thousand population, within a radius of five miles, and the surveyor's instruments alone tell where one borough ends and another begins.

Pittsburg proper is but the counting-house of this manufacturing population. Nearly all the great industrial works, whose accounts, office, and banking business center in the city, lie around her outskirts, and but few within her immediate limits.

The figures of the statement referred to were probably made up from the census returns of 1850. Those returns so far as they relate to Allegheny county are extremely incomplete, and nearly worthless. In those returns at best the sum of the products of Pittsburgh would be classed under the heads of the various boroughs, and but a limited portion under the head of Pittsburgh. With as much propriety should those amounts be classed under the heads of the several wards of the city, as any one of those taken as the census of the production of the whole.

The returns of sales made to the revenue officers, so far as they reach, are the best data of production. They do not, however, fully exhibit the facts, for the reason that the amounts unsold of the productions of any distinct period of time are to be added to the amount of those sold.

From returns made to revenue officers for a period of eighteen months, from September, 1863, to March, 1865, I give you the figures of some of the more important articles manufactured at Pittsburgh.

These figures are not an exhaustive or elaborate census of the manufactures of the city, but a condensation of some statistics derived from internal revenue returns in my possession upon leading articles. The figures are as follows:

Articles of Iron and Steel.

Axes, shovels, saws, spades, mattocks, picks,	$1,123,146
Boilers, shafting, steamboat irons, oil tools,
heavy blacksmithing.....	1,640,168
Bolts, nuts, spikes, rivets, washers, nails.....	3,518,559
Railroad chairs, springs, and axles.....	1,200,000
Iron and steel, bar, sheet, pig, plate, &c.....	28,843,123
Wrought iron, gas pipe, horse shoes, edge tools, iron ware.....	481,120
Machinery, castings, domestic hardware.....	6,392,087

Articles of Wood.

Barrels, barges, doors and sash frames, furniture, blocks, boxes.....	2,180,833
Chemicals.....	467,064

Articles of a Vegetable Nature.

Articles from Animals.

Leather, lard oil, glue, boots and shoes.....	2,553,307
-----------------------------------------------	-----------

Articles of a Liquid Nature.

Alc, whisky, wine, vinegar*.....	773,114
----------------------------------	---------

These figures make the sales of these few items in the period embraced over $74,000,000.

Although but a partial exhibit of the productive capacity and actual yield of Pittsburgh manufactures they are more than ample to show that Pittsburgh, instead of the fourteenth city of the Union in point of manufactures, is without doubt the third. If the manufacturing statistics of Pittsburgh were as elaborately collated as in other cities, where every article of raw material as well as those in the least transmuted is classed in the list of products, there is no doubt in my mind that Pittsburgh would lay claim to being the second manufacturing community of the Union.

Permit me in this connection to ask your attention to the necessity of the organization by the Government of some department similar, or of similar effects, to the national Board of Trade of Great Britain. That body make complete and detailed reports monthly of the trade and manufactures of that nation. Under the present census organization the people of the United States are, six years after the taking of the census of 1860, but partially acquainted with its results, while so imperfect are its figures that a high Government official is unwittingly made to commit a great act of injustice to the community of Pittsburgh, and, no doubt, from the same cause, to other cities as well.

Statistics are the data for not only the government of commercial transactions, but the foundation upon which the financial estimates of a nation should be made. To be valuable they should be fresh; the reflection of the current transactions of the country, not the echo of long past years. To be reliable they should be the result of competent labor, of intelligent minds, not the uneducated gatherings of incompetent and often ignorant men, claiming desultory employment as a reward for partisan devotion, as has been the case in the taking of the census heretofore.

The organization by Congress of a national Board of Trade, and an effort by that body to have the States also organize State boards, would put in motion a system of statistical information of great ultimate value.

Through such a system the country would be furnished with reliable statistics, and Congress would have a responsible source from which to learn the wants of the business of the nation, and form just estimates of its resources and its progress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

GEORGE H. THURSTON,

President of the Board of Trade of Pittsburgh.

To Hon. J. K. MOORHEAD, Washington, D. C.

* The fact that several breweries were confiscated last year for false returns accounts for the smallness of this class of product.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—AGAIN.

Mr. GARFIELD addressed the House. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

Mr. LE BLOND. The gentleman from Indiana yields to me to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I will state that I have given notice to the House I shall ask for a vote on the pending bill to-morrow at three o'clock. Several gentlemen desire to be heard on it. I want to say now there has been one speech made on that side of the House, and one speech made on this side, since the bill has been under debate, both of which were out of order, and that I shall feel it incumbent on me to take a point of order on other gentlemen on the one side or the other who do not confine themselves to a fair debate on the measure. I was not able to do it during the remarks of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] because I had consented that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAWSON] should take a wide range. I feel it to be my duty to say now that the bill should be debated. As I have said, I desire that the vote shall be taken to-morrow at three o'clock. If the gentleman wants to debate it, I shall be glad to hear him; but I hope the House will not adjourn. Let those who wish to debate the bill have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. STEVENS. Let us take a recess until half past seven this evening.

Several MEMBERS. For what purpose?

Mr. STEVENS. For the purpose of debate alone.

Mr. THAYER. I object, unless gentlemen shall promise to conform to the rules of the House.

Mr. KERR. I do not want to go on this evening.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask that my motion to adjourn shall be put to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion, so as to permit me to make another suggestion, that the House shall have an evening session for debate on the President's message alone.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. KERR. I withdraw my objection if the debate to-night is to be confined to the President's message.

Mr. LE BLOND moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a communication from Colonel Tal. P. Shaffner in reference to widening and deepening the Ohio river at the Grand Chain.

There was no objection, and the paper was received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—AGAIN.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, it is surely safe to assume that our country has known no hour, since the organization and establishment of our matchless form of Government, when its circumstances demanded in its Representatives a higher order of statesmanship, or a more unselfish devotion to those great principles of our system which stand like beacon-lights against dangerous boundaries, inviting the embarrassed mariner to safer paths. Desiring to keep these lights in view, and confessing with sincere earnestness my lack of both ability and experience, I beg leave to submit a few reflections upon some of the solemn questions that demand appropriate action at our hands. And I shall endeavor to do this in a spirit unshaded by the impulses of partisan feelings.

The true relations of the several States to the Union have always presented problems of great interest and considerable difficulty for determination by one or another of the departments of the Government. But now for the first time we are compelled to confront questions resulting from the temporary suspension of the constitutional relations between the United States and some of the States. This suspension was the result of a state of war between the legitimate Government and the States that attempted to secede therefrom. It is conceded by most men, and is declared by the highest judicial tribunal in the Union, that during that state of war the respective parties to it sustained to each other the relations of belligerents. At the threshold, therefore, it becomes material to inquire what is meant by a state of belligerency. In its primary signification, it means a state of war. It implies an issue, asserted on the one side and denied on the other, and submitted for decision to the solemn arbitrament of arms. The recognition of the existence of war; the tacit or express admission of belligerent rights by the legitimate Government, concedes nothing inconsistent with its claim of sovereignty over the revolted people and Territory. It does not even concede the existence of a Government de facto. But if it did, it would not at all impair the force of my argument, because the very term de facto implies a spurious Government, without rightful existence, as contradistinguished from a Government de jure, of right, or having rightful existence.

Mr. ELLIOT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The bill under consideration is a special order, and the gentleman from Indiana from the beginning of his speech shows he is about to discuss general questions, interesting to us all, of reconstruction and the condition of the rebel States. I have just given notice, whether the remarks came from one side or the other of the House, I should feel myself compelled to make the point of order. There are gentlemen who want to debate this bill who have had no opportunity to-day. I make the point of order that the gentleman's remarks are not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. DAVES in the chair.) The Chair is not able to sustain the point of order, as he has not heard enough of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman, however, must confine his remarks to the bill before the House.

Mr. KERR. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is in fact somewhat difficult to keep within the precise limits of that necessary discussion which should characterize the debates of this House; but here is a bill demanding at our hands action, which from its very nature goes into the States lately in rebellion, and can go there only on the ground taken by those who advocate this measure, that by reason of the rebellion they have the right to go there with this administration of government, dictated and controlled by Congress.

And yet they say, that in the discussion of this kind of measures we shall not take this wide range, of the true relations between the States and the Union. Now, I do not want to take as wide a range as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has taken, but I do want a liberal limit within which to express my ideas. And I say here, that this shall be confined to the discussion and elucidation of the bill before us.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one point of order already made and pending; therefore the Chair does not entertain the point at this time. The point pending is raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELLIOT,] that the argument of the gentleman from Indiana was not applicable to the bill before the House, and the Chair is listening to the suggestion which the gentleman from Indiana is making in order to satisfy the Chair that his remarks are pertinent.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to give way to a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana give way?

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HIGBY. I now move to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty minutes) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 2, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present to the Senate the petition of Mrs. Elizabeth R. Smith, of New London, Connecticut, the widow of Richard H. Smith, late a lieutenant in the third United States artillery, who was lost on board the steamer San Francisco, on the 24th of December, 1853, bound from New York to California with his regiment. The petitioner prays that compensation may be made to her for the property which was lost on the steamer and which was nearly all they had in the world. This petition will be referred, if there is no objection, to the Committee on Claims. It is so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio who served as soldiers in the armies of the United States, praying for an equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Manitowoc, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Manitowoc river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE. I also present the memorial of A. C. Sheldon and a large number of other citizens of the State of Wisconsin, praying that that portion of our people of African descent resident in the late insurgent States who were born on our soil; who have toiled without recompense that the nation might grow in wealth; who have willingly fought and labored in the Federal armies that the Republic might live and "receive no detriment;" who, during the late struggle for the preservation of our Union, were ever found faithful and loyal, while treason seemed to be or was the normal condition of many of the whites in the insurgent States; and who, by the chances of war, have been raised to the condition of free men, shall henceforth be classed as citizens of the United States; that the general rights and franchises belonging to citizens of the United States be henceforth extended to them; that the Government of the United States protect them in the exercise of those rights and franchises; that the recognition of said rights and franchises by the several late insurgent States, and also the recognition of the equality of the freedmen before the law with the citizens thereof, be a condition precedent to the readmission of said States to the full privileges of loyal States of the Union; that the Government retain the organization known as the Freedmen's Bureau over the late slave States of the Union, and increase its authority and efficiency; and that a system of free education be devised and put into operation in the insurgent States for the benefit of the children of all classes of the people thereof. I move the reference of this memorial to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN presented the memorial of A. L. H. Crenshaw, praying for compensation for property alleged to have been taken and destroyed by the United States authorities in the State of Missouri, while he was a prisoner of war on suspicion of being a rebel spy; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented resolutions of the Legislature of Oregon, in favor of the city of Portland, in that State, being included in the port of entry at the mouth of Columbia river, so that vessels entering at Astoria may unload at Portland, and that bonded warehouses may be established at the latter place; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 39) to amend the acts relating to officers employed in the examination of imported merchandise in the district of New York, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of F. A. Lewis, praying for compensation for negroes, horses, sheep, hogs, corn, &c., alleged to have been lost to him in consequence of the legislation of Congress and by acts of soldiers of the United States, and for indemnification against loss by certain acts of the so-called Confederate States, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William C. Anderson, jr., praying for a settlement of his father's accounts as pension agent at St. Louis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) to refer the claim of Gustavus A. Balzer to the Court of Claims, have directed me to report it back adversely; and I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES F. ANDERSON.

Mr. BROWN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 143) for the relief of Charles F. Anderson, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill on the day on which it is reported.

Mr. BROWN. I will explain the bill in a moment. This is a bill to compensate Mr. Anderson for his services as an architect, which passed the Senate at the last session and went to the House and was taken up and passed there, but, by some oversight, it was not handed to the President for his signature. It also passed the Senate at two preceding sessions. This is precisely the same bill, and I presume there will be no objection to it. I therefore ask that it be put on its passage at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles F. Anderson, architect, the sum of $7,500, in full, for time, labor, and expense in preparing plans and drawings for the Capitol extension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of John T. Jones, an Ottawa Indian, for depredations committed on his property by white persons in Kansas Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. NESMITH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 123) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, or the navigable waters of the Columbia river, in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 124) to incorporate the Washington Canal Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 125) granting aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the town of Folsom to the town of Placerville in the State of California; and a bill (S. No. 126) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the city of Placerville, in the State of California, to the most feasible point of intersection with the Pacific railroad, in the State of Nevada; which were severally read twice by their titles, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 28) carrying out the guarantee of a republican form of government in the Constitution of the United States, and enforcing the constitutional amendment for the prohibition of slavery; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the resolution be read at length.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas it is provided in the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government; and whereas by reason of the failure of certain States to maintain Governments which Congress can recognize, it has become the duty of the United States, standing in the place of guarantor, where the principal has made a lapse, to secure to such States, according to the requirement of the guarantee, governments republican in form; and whereas, further, it is provided in a recent constitutional amendment, that Congress may "enforce" the prohibition of slavery by "appropriate legislation," and it is important to this end that all relics of slavery should be removed, including all distinction of rights on account of color; now, therefore, to carry out the guarantee of a Republican form of government, and to enforce the prohibition of slavery,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all States lately declared to be in rebellion there shall be no oligarchy, aristocracy, caste, or monopoly invested with peculiar privileges or powers, and there shall be no denial of rights, civil or political, on account of color or race; but all persons shall be equal before the law, whether in the court-room or at the ballot-box; and this statute, made in pursuance of the Constitution, shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any such State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that this joint resolution be printed and lie on the table for the present. I give notice that I shall move it at the proper time as a counter proposition to the resolution proposing a constitutional amendment.

The joint resolution was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EXHIBITION OF MINERAL SPECIMENS.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 27) for the exhibition of specimens of gold and silver and other minerals, the product of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NYE. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. As it is deemed desirable that a collection of specimens of the gold and silver and other minerals of the United States should be made, and space provided for their exhibition and examination, in order that the citizens of the United States and other persons may obtain some adequate idea of the abounding and undeveloped wealth of the various portions of the public domain, and as the Patent Office, where are collected the models illustrating the inventive genius and productive industry of the people, and samples of the products of agriculture, is also deemed the proper place for an exhibition showing the mineral wealth of the country; the resolution, therefore, authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Interior to set apart in the Patent Office building such space as may be spared for the purpose, for the arrangement and exhibition, in cases specially provided and under his direction, of such specimens of gold and silver and other minerals, the product of mining skill and industry in the United States, as may be contributed for the purpose by its citizens; which specimens are to be considered as deposits, to be duly receipted for, and to remain the property of the depositors, and subject to their order.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 204) to regulate the registering of vessels, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LAND LOCATIONS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 36.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 36) quieting doubts in relation to the validity of certain locations of lands in the State of Missouri, made by virtue of certificates issued under the act of Congress of February 17, 1815, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill contains two sections, the first of which provides that all locations of lands in the State of Missouri, purporting to have been made by virtue of certificates issued under the act of Congress, approved February 17, 1815, entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, who suffered by earthquakes," which are invalid in consequence of having been made or located after the expiration of the time specified by law for making those locations, shall be as valid and as binding as if they had been made and fully completed within the time prescribed by law, provided they are according to law in all other respects; but this provision shall not apply to, comprehend, include, or extend to any land within township forty-five, north of the base line, in range seven, east of the fifth principal meridian line, in said State of Missouri.

By the second section the United States grant, relinquish, and convey in fee simple, and in full property, to James Y. O'Carroll, or his legal representatives, all of the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all of the land within survey No. 2498, in township forty-five, north of the base line in range seven east of the fifth principal meridian line, in the State of Missouri, being the same land that was located by virtue of the certificate No. 150 issued to James Y. O'Carroll or his legal representatives, under the act of Congress approved February 17, 1815. There is, however, a proviso that nothing in this section shall grant, relinquish, or convey the whole or any part of any lot, tract, piece, or parcel of land in that township, which has been heretofore confirmed by the United States to any person or persons, or to the legal representatives of any person or persons; and that nothing in this section shall in any manner abridge, divest, impair, injure, or prejudice any valid adverse right, title, or interest of any person or persons in or to any portion or part of the land which is granted, relinquished, and conveyed by the section.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would inquire of the Senator from New York if the proviso to the last section ought not to extend to the first. It occurs to me that under the first section of the bill there might be adverse rights; I do not know that there are any, but if there should be, ought they not to be protected in the same way as they are against the title that is acquired under the second section.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand that the first section of the bill applies to locations actually made—of course, therefore, there can be no adverse rights—locations made under land warrants granted under the act of 1815; but there is a doubt as to the validity of these locations under a decision of the Supreme Court which holds that no warrant, where the survey was not made within the time limited for the location, is valid. It is merely to validate locations which were supposed to have been well made before. It is, therefore, only to confirm the titles to locations actually made, but where no survey had been made in time. I have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office approving of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not persist in moving any amendment to the bill. I only wished to call the attention of the Senate to it. I observe that the first section of the bill reads, "That all locations of lands in the State of Missouri, purporting to have been made by virtue of certificates issued under the act of Congress," &c., shall be confirmed. There evidently is some dispute about this, or else there could be no occasion for the act. I am well aware that such is the case in regard to old confirmation claims. We have had a good many of them in the State of Illinois. There is a case now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States where a party claims land under a grant prior to 1800. That same land has been entered and patented by parties within a few years. That question is now being tested as to which of the parties is entitled to the land, in consequence, as is alleged, of a defect in the original grant, which, of course, would take the land if it were perfect.

Now, here it seems there is some question about these locations. I am not advised with regard to these particular lands, and only desire to call the attention of the Senator to the exception which I see is confined merely to the last section. It would do no hurt by possibility to say that "nothing in this act shall in any manner interfere with other claims." I am not sufficiently advised on the question to insist on it, but I suggest to the Senator that it is possible it might do injustice without a proviso.

Mr. HARRIS. I am in favor of some such provision as that, although I have no idea that it can apply to the first section. The trouble in relation to it is making out a perfect chain of title in the present occupants, holders, and claimants of these lands, inasmuch as the Supreme Court have held that their location is not valid. I have no objection to amending the bill in the way suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It can do no harm, and I think it a safer way of legislation. If it meets the views of the Senator from New York I move to amend the proviso by striking out the word "section" and inserting the word "act," so as to make it apply to the whole act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The word "section" occurs twice in the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Wherever it occurs in the proviso the word "act" will be substituted for it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF STAMPS AND ENVELOPES.

On the motion of Mr. DIXON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit, the pending question being on the amendment reported by Mr. Dixon from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever in his opinion the public service shall require, until the 30th day of June, 1868, to deposit postage stamps and stamped envelopes with such persons as he may select, for sale. The persons with whom stamps and stamped envelopes are so deposited shall engage to sell and circulate the same under the instructions of the Postmaster General, and shall give bond in such sum as the Postmaster General may direct, with one or more sureties, conditioned for the faithful keeping of the stamps and stamped envelopes so intrusted to them, and for the payment to the Post Office Department, in such manner as directed by the Postmaster General, of the moneys arising from the sale thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General may allow to such depositaries, under the provisions of this act, a commission not exceeding five per cent. on all sales of stamps and stamped envelopes by them made, and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department shall audit and settle all such accounts. Such persons shall be deemed receivers and custodians of public money. They shall not sell stamps or stamped envelopes on credit, but shall sell them invariably for coin or United States Treasury notes, and at a price not exceeding the price of such stamps and stamped envelopes as provided by law. They shall be subject to all the pains, penalties, fines, and forfeitures now provided by law in cases of receivers and custodians of public money, and of postmasters and other persons to whom the sale of stamps and stamped envelopes is intrusted.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. DIXON. The amendment proposed by the committee does not very much change the character of the bill; perhaps it does not change its legal effect at all. The bill originally provided that the Postmaster General might, at his discretion, sell on credit to such persons as he might think proper postage stamps and stamped envelopes. That was objected to as seeming to allow a sale on credit in certain cases, which was thought by the Senator from Nevada to be objectionable. To obviate this difficulty in a manner satisfactory to him, we propose to change the bill to the form now proposed, authorizing the Postmaster General to deposit with certain persons postage stamps and stamped envelopes for sale. That is the change and the only change which has been made in the bill by this amendment. It was thought better upon the whole to strike out the original bill and substitute a provision drawn in this form.

I will say, Mr. President, a very few words in regard to the object of the bill in addition to what I had the honor of submitting to the Senate a few days ago. The present condition of the States lately in rebellion is this: very few, or comparatively few, postmasters have been appointed, although the number itself seems large. It is, in comparison to the whole number, only about one fourth. There were formerly in those States eight thousand postmasters; there are now, I think, in round numbers, about two thousand appointed. The law provides that postmasters shall reside, at the time of their appointment, as it is understood, within the delivery of the post office for which they are appointed. It is, therefore, impossible to appoint some parties, indicated by the Senator from Nevada, who are now, perhaps, refugees from that country. Besides, if they could be appointed, the compensation would not pay them. The compensation of the greater number of these post offices is not such as to be profitable or even to support the postmaster. Then there is another difficulty in the way of the appointment of postmasters. The law requires that the postmasters shall take a retrospective test oath that they have never, in any manner, taken any part in the late rebellion.

For these reasons it is very difficult to find persons who can be appointed postmasters in large portions of that country, and as postmasters are the only persons who can receive postage stamps without paying for them at the time of their receipt, the people there are often obliged to pay as much as twenty-five and fifty cents postage on a single letter.

The business of the Post Office Department is to sell stamps. The Postmaster General supports his Department by the sale of stamps. He cannot at present, in very large districts of country, sell them at all, because parties cannot be found to advance the money, and indeed they have not the money to advance. Men can be found, however, who can receive the stamps and give bonds that they will pay for them, and they can sell them for cash and then refund the money to the Department. The object of the bill is to allow that to be done.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not mean to oppose the passage of this bill, but I think we ought to take advantage of this opportunity to give a warning again to the proper officers of Government that they must obey the laws of Congress. The bill as it was originally introduced by my friend from Connecticut was to enable the Postmaster General to get around the test oath. That was its object. It was so exposed by my friend from Nevada, [Mr. NYE.] I do not know that it is much changed by the amendment that is now under consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not changed at all.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it is not changed at all. Very well. I was about to say that I am not going to oppose it, but I wish here again to give notice to the proper authorities that they must obey the laws of the land, and I wish the Postmaster General of the United States to take notice. He is very much misrepresented, or he has not always lent his influence in favor of obedience to the laws of the land. Here on my table are letters, and I received one this morning of an important character, showing that there are at least some things in the Post Office Department leading in the same direction that we have had occasion to criticize in the Treasury Department through the defection of the latter Department to the law of the land. For instance, I have a letter here from Charleston, South Carolina, where the writer says:

"The post office is like everything else they do. The most of the employees belonged in the rebel army. No one else will get anything else to do here. The President's proclamation, saying 'Give the appointments to all loyal southerners,' was a regular humbug. If he had said 'Give it to all rebels,' then it would have been more properly spoken, for the latter is invariably the case."

As I said before, I received a letter this morning, which was also from Charleston, from which I have just read. The letter was from a person whose name, if I should mention it, would not be unknown on this floor, and who has personal relations with a very prominent member of the Administration, in which he makes the same complaint, and especially with regard to the post office at Charleston, that Union people have no chance; it is rebels only that can find a place under these new auspices. Here, for instance, is another letter which I have received, signed very extensively by gentlemen from Georgia, and also from Virginia, from which I will read only a brief extract:

"The President, early in his administration, said that no rebel should be appointed to office in the South; and if loyal men could not be found in sufficient numbers, then he would import them."

"Import them," let me remind my friend from Connecticut, take them to the place where the office was to be filled and plant them there—that was the language of the President, and is so quoted by these gentlemen. They proceed:

"But this is all forgotten now, and Congress is deliberately asked by a Cabinet officer to repeal the test oath that rebels may get pay for positions which they now fill contrary to law. This is a deliberate bribe for treason and an insult to loyalty, and hence the common assertion among Union men, that it pays to be a rebel. This is doubtless the fact in Georgia as in Virginia. They get the offices in the revenue departments, as well as in the post offices and the mail contracts, as may be seen by a slight examination, nearly all over the State. Not many weeks since, two loyal men from this district?"

This is from Fredericksburg—

"were applicants for mail routes; one had been a scout in the Union Army. The route for which this last applied was given to a rebel colonel, and the first to a rebel soldier. The assertion that loyal and capable men to fill the revenue offices in Georgia cannot be obtained and rebels have to be appointed instead, is doubtless a gross misrepresentation in the rebel interest, the same falsehood having been circulated as regards this State?"

That is, Virginia.

"Such statements are an insult to the loyal men of the South, and as such we repel them with indignation and scorn, come from whatever source they may."

Here is another letter from a person well known, in reply to the very suggestion that Union people cannot be found to fill these offices:

"And among this pile of ruined rubbish we once in awhile meet with a Union volunteer. There is no mistaking the plant when pure. I found some of the purest in the South I have ever met. No class of Americans have suffered so much and none have had so little encouragement. To be a southerner by birth and a Union man is to incur the undying hatred of all good disloyalists."

"Before closing my letter I will call your attention to Mr. Secretary McCulloch's report on the employment of men who cannot take the oath. I differ from Mr. McCulloch in this matter of appointments in the States lately in rebellion. I do not believe there is any necessity for employing one man who cannot take the oath. I can fill all the offices under the Government at the South by able and talented southern Union soldiers. There are ten in this city, and not one of them can get employment from the Government. There is not a Union soldier employed in any civil office under the Government in this city, while it is notorious that many in this city and State are employed who cannot take the oath."

Now, sir, I do not know that the Postmaster General has erred as openly, as defiantly, as wrongly as the Secretary of the Treasury has erred, but according to the testimony of these letters he has failed to exert any decisive influence for loyal men, and I think, now that we are about to pass this bill, he ought to take notice that by the law of the land loyal men only are to receive appointments from the Government, and that to the extent of his influence loyal men should be encouraged in the post offices of the country. I do not know that he has made appointments in defiance of law; but it will not be denied that there are post offices which are nests of disloyalty.

Mr. DIXON. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will be happy to hear that he is mistaken with regard to the practice of the Postmaster General on this subject. The Postmaster General informed me, in the presence of the honorable Senator from Nevada, that he had never, knowingly, appointed any man to the office of postmaster who could not take the test oath, and was not a loyal man.

Now, with regard to another intimation of the Senator, he states that men should, or might, in certain cases be imported to fill these offices.

Mr. SUMNER. President Johnson says that.

Mr. DIXON. Very well; President Johnson took that ground. Now, I wish the Senator to look for a single moment at the provision of the law in regard to postmasters. The law provides that the postmaster shall be a resident of the delivery district. It is possible there might be some refugee found who might be considered a resident of some of these districts, but how many districts must there be in which no such men can be found. You perhaps could find many men in the city of Washington who could be imported into these districts, but it must be a district in which the person formerly resided, or he does not come within the law.

But again, what is the office worth? Fifty, seventy-five, or a hundred dollars; a large majority of them, almost all, less than $100. Can you send a man down there to fill that office for that salary? Of course you cannot. It is therefore utterly impossible to appoint postmasters unless you can find some man within the delivery district who can take the test oath. In point of fact, it is considered somewhat difficult to get men to take the offices at all, not only in that portion, but in many other portions of the country, where the pay is small. You must find some retailer at a cross-roads to take it, or it will not be taken at all. The pay is nothing. The office is a mere convenience to the neighborhood.

It is my opinion that the Postmaster General has honestly obeyed the law upon this subject. We have his statement with regard to it. If he has not, what is the object of this bill? If he is appointing disloyal postmasters, they cannot receive the stamps without paying for them. It is because he will not do that that he desires the privilege of depositing stamps with parties who cannot be appointed to the office. We never have taken the ground, nobody has gone so far, the Senator from Massachusetts does not go so far, as to say that the Government should not sell a postage stamp to a man who cannot take the test oath. Nobody claims that. I think, therefore, that the Senator, as well as the Senator from Nevada, will withdraw his objection to this bill, if he has any.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in the form in which this bill now stands I shall vote for it very cheerfully. I think it is intended for a good purpose by the Postmaster General, who, I believe, desires to comply with the existing laws. I believe it is his intention to comply with the law in the future. I think that if we pass this bill it will do us no harm and may be of advantage to that section of the country. While I go as far as he who goes farthest in demanding all the necessary guarantees for the security of the rights of all men, and for the repose of the country in the future, I intend to give every vote that I am called upon to give here that will develop and improve the condition of that portion of our common country. That they will reap every act of ours with reproaches is possible; but we have had a great contest; they are defeated; we are the victors; we are not their enemies, but we are the friends of our whole country and the cause of justice and liberty. We can afford to do right and be just, and let them say or do just what they please, it is our high duty to the whole country and all its people. Whenever I can give a vote that shall improve the value of an acre of land, or secure the rights or interests of any man there, or develop the resources of that portion of the country, or in any way accommodate that people, I intend to give that vote. I believe this measure will be for their interest, and will harm no one in any respect whatever; and so believing I shall vote for it.

I believe it to be the duty of the executive officers of the Government to religiously comply with the laws of the land, and to employ proper men in that section of the country to fill the offices and to do the business; but under existing laws the Postmaster General cannot accommodate, at any rate at once, the people of that section of the country; and I understand that this bill is introduced here with the view of accommodating the people on account of the difficulty of finding loyal men to fill their post offices. Believing that its passage can do no harm to the country, that it will be safe, and will be an advantage not only to that section but to all portions of the country, I shall cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. NYE. I am not quite willing to be left in exactly the position in which I am placed by being told by the Senator from Connecticut and my honorable friend from California that there has been no change in the bill, and yet that I am satisfied with it as it is, when I opposed it so strenuously the other day. If their construction of the bill is true, I desire still to oppose it; but, sir, I do not think it is true. What satisfied me with the bill was, that they struck out the words "selling upon credit." I am willing that the Postmaster General shall be responsible for these stamps, and deposit them where he pleases; he must account to the Government for them; but I was entirely unwilling that he should open the Department as a department of merchandise and for selling stamps upon credit. If that makes no difference in the bill, I am unable to comprehend what my friends would call a difference.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the Postmaster General did consider that this amendment made an important difference in the bill, and he told me that he intended to have it drawn in this shape at first, but by mistake it was drawn up by a clerk in the form in which it was originally presented here, which was objectionable to him. I merely intended to say that I did not see that the amendment altered the bill in its legal effect.

Mr. NYE. I do.

Mr. CONNESS. I will not undertake to add anything to what has been said on this subject as the time for voting has arrived, if the bill is to be voted upon this morning, and I hope we may get a vote. If the Senator from Nevada is satisfied with the change, I am sure I am. I know there is a change in the language.

Mr. NYE. If my friend is satisfied with it, I am. If he is satisfied with his version that there is no change, I am satisfied with my own, that there is a most material one; and so was the Postmaster General.

Mr. CONNESS. Then we are both pleased.

Mr. COWAN. I have only a word to say, and it is rather general than particular. It has been the custom here recently to assail members of the Cabinet for derelictions of duty, and to base charges against them upon anonymous letters. Sir, I think that is not fair to gentlemen holding the responsible positions that the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury hold to this country. I think it is exceedingly unfair that their influence and the confidence the country has in them should be attempted to be weakened and destroyed in this way. Here we have letters read this morning which assail the action of the Postmaster General. Have the writers of those letters, if they are respectable men—and perhaps the legal presumption, if all legal presumptions are not now to be traversed, is in favor of the fact that they are respectable—have they informed these officers of the means by which these difficulties can be avoided? And if they have not informed them, by what warrant are they to come here, in the first and the highest council of the country, to assail them? The writer of one of these letters says there is no difficulty about this matter; the Postmaster General is entirely derelict in his duty, or he is mistaken as to the means which he has within his reach to perform that duty. He says he could fill all the offices in the South ten times over with loyal men, with Union soldiers, if you please. Why has he not given the proper officer that information? Why does he wait until that officer comes here and asks for power to avoid the difficulty before he discloses that there was a legitimate and lawful means of performing it within the reach of the officer?

Mr. President, I have no disposition to become either the counsel, the advocate, or the friend of these officers; but I do dislike, in an assembly of this kind, where these men have no opportunity to be heard in reply, that these insinuations should be cast upon them, and that the country should be led to believe that somehow or other, covertly, they are trying to do something which is inconsistent with the duty they owe to their country and their sworn obedience to the law. This is openly charged here as being in violation of the law. It either is, or is not. If it is in violation of the law, I would be more inclined to believe the officer, that the obstacle in his way was insurmountable, and that he violated the law only because there was a paramount obligation resting upon him to carry out a higher and a paramount law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. DIXON. I hope that by general consent the vote will be allowed to be taken upon this bill.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that will be done. I understand there is no serious objection to the passage of the bill, and I desire its passage because I think it is necessary to the proper working of the Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I must insist on the order of the day this morning, because we have an hour fixed for voting upon it, and if we lose part of the time now it will interfere with that arrangement.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator must see that the bill can be passed now immediately.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Senators are constantly rising to speak upon it.

Mr. DIXON. There will be no further debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the vote can be taken at once without further debate, I will not object.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the order of the day be laid over informally until a vote can be taken upon this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside informally if there be no objection. None being made, Senate bill No. 71 is still before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIXON. I move to amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "on credit," so that it will read: "A bill relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, and that will stand as the title of the bill, if there be no objection.

Mr. NYE. It seems to me, to make the title consonant with the bill, it should read: "A bill to authorize the Postmaster General to deposit postage stamps and stamped envelopes for sale."

Mr. DIXON. I consent to that amendment. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be so amended.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 61) to establish certain post roads, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication; upon which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to give way to allow me—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It will not take so long as the objection. I merely desire to obtain leave to withdraw from the files some papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator from Illinois will not take it out of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable Senator from Kentucky allow me to make a motion?

Mr. DAVIS. If this time is not charged against the bill, if I receive credit for it, I am willing to give way.

Mr. JOHNSON. It will take but a moment to act on the motion I desire to make.

Mr. DAVIS. With the general understanding that we shall have what time is lost by these preliminary proceedings, I am ready to give way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to any interference with the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would respectfully ask the Senator from Kentucky if he yields the floor to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DAVIS. Under the protest of the honorable Senator from Illinois I do not feel willing to do so.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Kentucky—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor, and declines to yield. It is his prerogative to hold the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I appeal to the Senator from Kentucky—

Mr. DAVIS. I yield the floor for the purpose the Senator from Wisconsin desires.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to state to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that I did not seek the floor for any purpose of interfering with his remarks, but merely to ask leave to withdraw from the files certain papers and refer them to a committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I am satisfied—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If this explanation is not satisfactory—

Mr. DAVIS. It is perfectly so to me, but whether it is to the Senator from Illinois is another question. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not satisfactory to me. We have a morning hour for all this morning business, and it interrupts the progress of business, delays our proceedings, to come in at these irregular times with business belonging to the morning hour. If the Senator from Wisconsin will state that there is any importance whatever in withdrawing the papers to-day, instead of the next morning hour, I shall withdraw any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks leave to have an order entered to have certain papers withdrawn. It requires the common consent of the Senate to entertain that motion, there being another matter before the Senate. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Illinois to object to the motion being entertained?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very sorry that the obduracy of my friend from Illinois will not permit me to exercise my usual courtesy toward the honorable Senator from Wisconsin and the honorable Senator from Maryland. It would afford me great pleasure to do so.

The honorable Senator from Illinois stated yesterday—but he was brought to that position very late in the debate—that the object of this bill was essential to perform the office of a declaratory law; that this bill was merely intended to declare some principles of the Constitution. I propose to test the sincerity of the honorable Senator by offering an amendment which I send to the Chair and ask to have read; and upon it I have some remarks to make. I offer it as a substitute for the whole bill.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

And be it further enacted, That any person or persons who shall subject or cause to be subjected a citizen of any of the United States to the deprivation of any privilege or immunity in any other State to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution and laws of the United States, such person or persons shall be liable to be sued for damages by the party injured, and shall also be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the jury.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I hold that there is no legitimate power to pass any law connected with the subject of this bill, except what is contained in the clause of the Constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." If there is any broader or other power vested in Congress to pass the measure under consideration, or any cognate measure, I would thank the able and learned Senator from Illinois to point it out to the Senate. Holding that, then, to be the sole and exclusive power that is vested in Congress over the subject-matter of this bill, I will proceed to make some remarks upon the amendment and upon the bill.

What does the amendment propose to do? It recites almost literally, certainly substantially, the clause of the Constitution declaring that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. An act of Congress that is not declaratory in its character, but is intended to execute and give effect to that clause of the Constitution, is every law and contains every provision in relation to the subject that can be properly comprehended in a law of Congress. I then by my amendment propose to embody this provision of the Constitution in the law, and to declare that the rights secured by this provision of the Constitution shall be made good to each citizen of the United States by legislative enactment, and by an enactment having the sanction of the same penalty which the honorable Senator from Illinois has proposed to attach to his bill.

Mr. President, since last evening I have been looking into the bill that is now under consideration, and the more I study it and the better I understand it, according to my feeble reason, the more offensive it is to me, and in my opinion the more vulnerable it is to objections growing out of the Constitution, and to objection on the ground of injustice and impolicy generally.

Before I proceed further, the nature of the subject-matter of my amendment requires me to make a general remark in relation to the theory and principle of our Government. The General Government is only invested with power over such matters as concern the relations between the United States and foreign countries, among the States themselves, and between the United States and the Indian tribes. All other matters of Government, as a general rule and a general principle, are reserved to the States respectively or the people, and the General Government, by any of its departments, has no jurisdiction over those other subjects. One of the articles of amendment to the Constitution adopted soon after the organization of the Government explicitly states this principle in express language; but the Supreme Court have said, and in my judgment most truly, that that article reserving to the States the powers not delegated need not have been introduced; that the Constitution, from its very nature and its principles, would have meant the same without that article that it does with it; but to prevent any doubt upon the point, and to place it beyond all controversy, the Constitution expressly says that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." If there ever was a principle of government that was in conflict with a proposed bill, this principle is in conflict with the bill under consideration. The ingenuity of man could not frame a bill that would be more generally and more flagitiously in conflict with the two clauses of the Constitution which I have just read. Every power of legislation and of government that is not delegated by the Constitution to the General Government is reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. In other words, the General Government, and consequently the Congress of the United States, has no jurisdiction over any subjects except those that are delegated by the Constitution to the General Government. The honorable Senator from Illinois, I presume, will not controvert this principle; but I can hardly say that, for I do not know now what he would not controvert. He seems to be one of the progressives. This is a moving age, and the tendency to encroach upon the Constitution, the tendency to despotism and consolidation, is moving on, and the bill now under consideration, and its Siamese twin that we passed last week, give about as much impetus in that direction as any two measures that have ever been before Congress.

Now, Mr. President, what is the power that is vested in Congress on the subject of this bill?

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

If the Senate would act legitimately upon this subject, its action must be confined to such matters as concern the citizens of different States. It has no power whatever to act in relation to the matters of this bill so far as those matters concern the citizens of a single State. Let me illustrate this, if I can, by the subject that is the main subject of this bill, the free negro. There are, let me say for argument's sake, two hundred thousand free negroes in the State of Kentucky that were born there, that have never been residents of any other State. The honorable Senator proposes to make these two hundred thousand negroes and every free negro in America, whether he has ever been out of the State in which he was born and in which he resides, or not, the subject of this bill. It is not competent for the Senate to pass a bill embracing such classes of our population. The clause of the Constitution which I have read does not refer to people in their condition. It refers to the citizens of each State being entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. When does this principle of the Constitution apply? Under what state of facts does it arise? To what state of facts can it be made applicable? Only when a citizen of one State goes into another State, either to change his residence to that other State, or to acquire property there, or to exercise some other right or privilege which a citizen of that other State is entitled to in that State.

I do not know that I make myself understood by the honorable chairman. I will endeavor, though, to do so. He proposes now to apply his bill to every citizen of the United States, without regard to color, where that citizen is domiciled in the State in which he was born, and when he has no purpose to leave and is not in the act of leaving that State to go into another; and that is intended to be the great form in which this bill is to have all of its application. Now, I say that the bill constitutionally can have no such application.

I agree that if the negro is a citizen he is to be treated exactly as a white citizen except so far as, if to any extent, there be exceptions to his prejudice and in favor of the white citizen by the express language of the Constitution. I made the issue with the honorable Senator the other day, which I still maintain, that a negro is not a citizen; but if the proposition be true that a negro is a citizen, I concede that he is entitled to every right, every privilege, and every immunity to which a white citizen is entitled under the Constitution. My position is, that if a white man was claiming the benefit of this provision of the Constitution, and he was a resident of the State of Maine or of the State of Kentucky, remaining there, not going into another State for the purpose of changing his residence or to claim any immunity or privilege of a citizen in another State, under the Constitution, we could not embrace him by any act which we could pass in virtue of this provision of the Constitution. Certainly, by a legal mind as astute and as learned as that of my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] that proposition cannot be doubted. Now, sir, I throw myself back upon the original, primary, general principle of the division of the powers of the Government which I stated at the commencement of my remarks this morning, namely, that in relation to the citizens of a State and to all questions and matters that arise within a State and that do not relate to acts, privileges, and immunities that lie between two States, but that are entirely local to a particular State, jurisdiction was expressly reserved by the States to themselves and withheld from and denied to the General Government. I suppose that no sound lawyer, whose mind is free from prejudice and has not been infected by the fanaticism and the wild dreams of liberty and of philanthropy that have sprung up in this day and generation, would doubt that principle.

What, then, does this bill propose to do? It proposes to go into Kentucky, and to regulate the free negro of that State who was born there, who has lived there always, whose business and interests are entirely local to that State. Where is the clause in the Constitution that authorizes Congress to interpose by its legislative powers, and to seize from the State of Kentucky her exclusive right to control the negro population that I have thus described, and all their transactions and all their interests—to draw this local subject, reserved by the States to themselves in the Constitution, to the legislative powers of Congress?

Sir, the authorities which were the other day read and relied upon by the honorable Senator from Illinois overthrow his premises; they contravene his principles and all the conclusions which he draws from them. They expressly and explicitly sustain the view which I am now taking of the subject. Let me turn to those authorities and read a few passages from them. First, let me read from the case of Campbell vs. Morris, in 3 Harris & McHenry's Reports. In that case Mr. Justice Chase said:

"By the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States."

"Privilege and immunity" are synonymous, or nearly so. Privilege signifies a peculiar advantage, exemption, immunity; immunity signifies exemption, privilege.

"The peculiar advantages and exemptions contemplated under this part of the Constitution may be ascertained, if not with precision and accuracy, yet satisfactorily."

"By taking a retrospective view of our situation antecedent to the formation of the first General Government, or the Confederation, in which the same clause is inserted verbatim, one of the great objects must occur to every person, which was the enabling the citizens of the several States to acquire and hold real property in any of the States, and deemed necessary, as each State was a sovereign, independent State, and the States had confederated only for the purposes of general defense and security, and to promote the general welfare."

"It seems agreed, from the manner of expounding or defining the words 'immunities' and 'privileges' by the counsel on both sides, that a particular and limited operation is to be given to these words, and not a full and comprehensive one. It is agreed it does not mean the right of election, the right of holding offices, the right of being elected."

And in this respect the decision was somewhat with the great authority of my honorable friend from Maryland:

"The court are of opinion it means that the citizens of all the States shall have the peculiar advantage of acquiring and holding real as well as personal property, and that such property shall be protected and secured by the laws of the State in the same manner as the property of the citizens of the State is protected. It means such property shall not be liable to any taxes or burdens which the property of the citizen is not subject to. It may also mean, that as creditors, they shall be on the same footing with the State creditor, in the payment of the debts of a deceased debtor. It secures and protects personal rights."

These principles are all correctly laid down, according to my judgment. I agree with the Maryland judge in relation to these premises. He further says:

"The way to expound a clause in the General Government or Constitution of the United States is by comparing it with other parts, and considering them together; and to lay a foundation for a right exposition in the present case, it will be proper to suggest a few plain principles."

"1. That Congress can exercise no power as a legislative body but what is vested in them by the Constitution; it being under and by virtue of that instrument alone they derive their powers."

The Supreme Court also consider Congress as possessing those powers which arise from the Constitution by necessary implication; but this decision goes on:

"2. All power, jurisdiction, and rights of sovereignty, not granted by the people by that instrument, or relinquished, are still retained by them in their several States, and in their respective State Legislatures, according to their forms of government."

"Uniformity of laws in the States is contemplated by the General Government only in two cases, on the subject of bankruptcies and naturalization."

"The legislative powers of Congress are particularly defined in the eighth section of the first article."

"Those powers do not interfere with or abridge the power of the States to make local regulations, the operation of which is confined to the State."

There is the great principle to which I wish to invite the attention of the honorable Senator from Illinois, and of gentlemen upon this floor who advocate and intend to vote for this bill. This authority is express that Congress has no powers except what are conferred by the Constitution; that outside of the powers conferred by the Constitution, Congress can exercise no legislative authority whatever; that the legislative powers of Congress are particularly defined in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, and those powers this court say expressly "do not interfere with or abridge the power of the States to make local regulations the operation of which is confined to the State." The power of the State of Kentucky to legislate for her own free negroes, in relation to all their rights, privileges, and immunities, in relation to all their property, so far as those laws are to apply locally to that State and operate within that State, according to the authority relied upon by the honorable Senator from Illinois himself, is a power that belongs exclusively to the State, and Congress has no authority to grasp it as a subject of congressional legislation. That is in obedience to the great principle by which the powers of the State governments and those of the General Government are separated. It is in conformity to and in strict harmony with the great principle that Congress has no power to regulate any concerns in the States except those that relate to two or more States; that within a single State, all subjects of legislation, all persons that are subject to legislation, and all their rights, privileges, and immunities, so far as these are limited and restricted to the State and the laws, are to operate within the State, belong to the State exclusively. This opinion further says:

"The restrictive clauses in the tenth section of the first article, limiting the powers of the States, are confined to certain enumerated cases, none of which comprehend the subject under consideration: the power of regulating process for the more effectual recovery of debts."

That reasoning establishes another principle, that when a matter is enumerated specially: when a power is conferred by express words, and that power is vested in a particular magistracy, no other power can be claimed, and no other magistracy than the one named can exercise that power within the Constitution.

Now let me read a few sentences from the decision of Chief Justice Parker in the case in 6 Pickering, to which the honorable Senator referred. There is a point of debate and of doubt between his opinion and those of his associate judges; and it is whether after a citizen of one State has moved to another State, and become a resident of that other State, he can claim any right whatever under the clause of the Constitution which gives to the citizens of one State the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. Chief Justice Parker seems to think that this right attaches and can only be claimed and exercised when the citizen has moved from one State to another. The two other judges, in rendering their opinions, treat it differently, and, in my poor judgment, treat it correctly. They hold that where a citizen of one State has removed to another to reside there, he ceases to be the subject of the provision of the Constitution which I have read in relation to the rights of a citizen in another State. It is only when he goes there as a visitor, when he goes there to purchase property, when he goes to the second State for purposes of temporary residence, or to do any act which the citizen of one State may lawfully and constitutionally claim to do in another State—it is only while he occupies that predicament and that condition that he places himself within the pale of this constitutional provision. So Judge Chase, of Maryland, adjudged, as I understand his opinion; and so did Mr. Justice Washington in the opinion which is reported in his Circuit Court Reports; but Mr. Chief Justice Parker seems to treat the matter differently; and I will read from his decision so much as bears upon this point:

"Before the adoption of the national Constitution, if a husband of Massachusetts deserted his wife and removed into another State, making no provision for her, and forbidding her to follow him, assuming a new marriage relation de facto in his adopted State, the wife remaining here working for her support, he exercising all the rights of a citizen of the other State and never intending to return, would not this amount to an abridgment of his native State, so that his wife might have the privileges and be liable to the burdens of a feme sole here? We think it would. Does then the Union of the States, or the provision in the Constitution referred to, make a difference? The jurisdictions of the several States as such, are distinct, and in most respects foreign. The Constitution of the United States makes the people of the United States subjects of one Government quoad everything within the national power and jurisdiction, but leaves them subjects of separate and distinct governments."

As to everything not within the Federal jurisdiction the States are considered as separate and foreign governments. That is an indubitable principle of our system, and it is here recognized distinctly by Chief Justice Parker; and he goes on to say:

"The privileges and immunities secured to the people of each State in every other State, can be applied only in case of removal from one State into another."

In that position I think the learned judge was in error, but I may be mistaken.

"By such removal they become citizens of the adopted State without naturalization."

I admit that they have a right to go there and become residents there. That is a right which appertains to them as citizens of the State from whence they removed; but when they have moved and changed their residence they have exhausted all the rights that they are entitled to under the provision which I have read from the Constitution, and they become subject to the same laws and the same rules of legislation that the citizens of the State to which they have removed are subject. The learned judge says:

"By such removal they become citizens of the adopted State without naturalization, and have a right to sue and be sued as citizens; and yet this privilege is qualified and not absolute, for they cannot enjoy the right of suffrage, or of eligibility to office, without such term of residence as shall be prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State into which they shall remove. They shall have the privileges and immunities of citizens, that is, they shall not be deemed aliens, but may take and hold real estate, and may, according to the laws of such State, eventually enjoy the full rights of citizenship without the necessity of being naturalized."

I accord to the positions which are here stated; but I go further, and I say that the rights which may be claimed by a citizen of one State in another State take effect and apply to the citizen practically before he has removed his residence into the other State, and they apply for some purposes after that removal has taken place.

"The constitutional provision referred to is necessarily limited and qualified, for it cannot be pretended that a citizen of Rhode Island, coming into this State to live, is ipso facto entitled to the full privileges of a citizen, if any term of residence is prescribed as preliminary to the exercise of political or municipal rights. The several States, then, remain sovereign to some purposes, and foreign to each other, as before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and especially in regard to the administration of justice, and in the regulation of property and estates, the laws of marriage and divorce, and the protection of the persons of those who live under their jurisdiction. No process can go from one State into another, nor can the citizen of one State be made amenable to the laws of another, unless he come within its jurisdiction."

What principles are here laid down? That for all purposes of government except those vested in the Government of the United States by the Constitution expressly, the States occupy the position and relationship of foreign Governments; each State legislates for itself as distinctly as a foreign Government would legislate, and is no more bound by the legislation of Congress in relation to the matters herein enumerated than would be the Government of England or of France or of any foreign country. Let me read again from this decision:

"The several States then remain sovereign to some purposes and foreign to each other, as before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and especially in regard to the administration of justice, and in the regulation of property and estates, the laws of marriage and divorce, and the protection of the persons of those who live under their jurisdiction."

Here is the authority relied upon by the honorable Senator from Illinois himself, which expressly and triumphantly overturns the position which he assumes in his bill. In this bill he proposes to legislate by Congress for the resident negro in Kentucky, born there, who has always lived there, and who intends to remain there for his lifetime, and for every negro in America. This authority holds that the States are sovereign, "especially in regard to the administration of justice, and in the regulation of property and estates, the laws of marriage and divorce, and the protection of the persons of those who live under their jurisdiction." This authority expressly lays it down that all these subjects are the distinctive and exclusive subjects of State legislation; that over them the authority, the jurisdiction of the respective States is as though the States were foreign countries. It occurred to me from the manner in which the honorable Senator was scrapping these opinions, that he was not reading the whole of them, that he was not reading enough of them to give the Senate a full and just conception of the principles decided by them; and when they are referred to, my suspicion is abundantly confirmed, is clearly established; for, on eviscerating the opinions and seeing the principles that are decided in them, I find that they are not only in conflict with, but that they expressly overturn all the provisions of the honorable Senator's bill, even upon the principle that the negro is a citizen, so far as the bill is intended to operate upon the local inhabitants of Kentucky, or of any other State. Now, sir, I turn your guns upon you, and I am endeavoring to make them thunder in your frail works, and it requires but one or two shots to utterly demolish them; and here is a shot that does utterly demolish them:

"The several States, then, remain sovereign to some purposes and foreign to each other, as before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and especially in regard"—

Especially do they remain foreign to each other and to the General Government just as they were before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, says the learned judge—

"In regard to the administration of justice, and in the regulation of property and estates, the laws of marriage and divorce, and the protection of the persons of those who live under their jurisdiction."

Will the honorable Senator when he comes to respond, if he deigns to reply—I do not care whether he does or not—tell the Senate from whence he derives the power to apply this bill to a free negro or a white local resident citizen of Kentucky, who is not going into another State, who has no business transactions in another State, who does not propose to go into another State at all? In relation to the administration of justice to such people, in the regulation of the property and estates of such people, in the laws of marriage and divorce as applicable to such people, and in the protection of the persons of those people who live entirely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of Kentucky and the other States, where is the authority derived by which Congress claims the right to legislate in respect to them as people, without any regard to their relationship, personal or business, with any other State?

I have got the other decision to which the honorable Senator referred before me, but I will not read from it except to quote the extract which the honorable gentleman embodied in his speech and upon which he relied, and it is just as hostile to his position and his bills as the two from which I have read.

"But, sir," says the honorable gentleman—

"The decision most elaborate upon this clause of the Constitution is to be found in Washington's Circuit Court Reports, in a case which was reserved for consideration after argument. I will read several sentences from the opinion of the circuit judge, because it will bespeak that he enumerates the very rights belonging to a citizen of the United States which are set forth in the first section of this bill."

Yes, he does, but to whom does he attach them? Who does he say are entitled to these rights? The citizens of the other State; and not the citizen of the State who has been born in and has been local to his State all the time. Let me read what the honorable Senator has extracted from Judge Washington's decision:

"The next question is, whether this act infringes that section of the Constitution which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?"

"The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free Governments; and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the Government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind; and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one State to pass through, or to reside in any other State, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the State to take, hold, and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the State, may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental; to which may be added the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or constitution of the State in which it is to be exercised."—Coryfield vs. Coryell, 4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, page 330.

In relation to the other rights, except the right to vote, which this judge says only attaches when the party removing from one State into another has become a citizen of the second State, and has conformed to all the laws regulating the right to vote in that State, what description of persons does he apply then to? Who does he say are entitled to these other rights?

"The right of a citizen of one State to pass through, or to reside in any other State, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the State to take, hold, and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the State, may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental; to which may be added the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or constitution of the State in which it is to be exercised."

All these rights and privileges are attributed by the decision of the court to the citizens of one State going into another State. If Senators will examine this opinion, they will find that every doctrine laid down by it, and every right and privilege of the citizen that it establishes under the clause of the Constitution which I have read, appertains to a citizen residing in his own State and claiming these immunities or privileges in another State, or they attach to a citizen of one State who has removed into the other State and changed his relationship.

The opinions relied on by the honorable Senator do not establish any other proposition. On the contrary, they negative almost in positive terms—they do, as satisfactorily as though the language they used was ever so positive, negative the idea that a citizen, black or white, of a State, born in that State, having no business, no transactions in another State, not having gone into another State to change his place of residence, but still living and residing in the State where he was born, is or can become the subject of congressional legislation under this provision of the Constitution. Such a citizen is not in a condition, not in a predicament, to claim the advantage of this provision of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I then come to the conclusion, and I think that it is legitimately reached, it is reached in virtue of the gentleman's authorities, that his bill, so far as it legislates upon the person or property of white citizens or negroes who have always lived in one State, and who have no business and no transactions and claim no rights and no immunities in another State, is flagrantly unconstitutional and void.

There is one other feature of the bill upon which I shall say a word. I was surprised and astonished to hear the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] announce that all negroes born in the United States were citizens, and that Congress might pass an act declaring them to be citizens, and that they would thereby be entitled to the right of suffrage.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable Senator misunderstood me. I said that but for the decision in the Dred Scott case I should have held so.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, if that decision had never been rendered I think the proposition that they were not citizens and would not be entitled to vote is just as strong. I ask the honorable Senator if Congress can make a citizen at all. I say Congress cannot. Congress has no power to make a citizen. If Congress has the power to make a citizen, it has the power under the Constitution. Will the honorable Senator from Maryland or the honorable Senator from Illinois read me the provision of the Constitution that authorizes Congress to make a citizen, or refer me to it? The only power of Congress over that subject is contained in these words:

"Congress shall have power to adopt a uniform rule of naturalization."

Congress may create the rule; it may prescribe the authority to make a citizen; but it cannot exercise that power itself. Congress may establish courts inferior to the Supreme Court; but that does not authorize Congress to adjudicate cases, or to exercise any of the judicial power of the Government. It may create tribunals—that the Constitution authorizes—to administer those powers; but the faculty and the power of Congress to organize those tribunals does not authorize Congress to do the acts of adjudication or of administration which these functionaries, after they are organized by Congress, are authorized by the Constitution to execute. I say it would be just as legitimate and as constitutional for Congress, under its power to pass laws establishing courts subordinate to the Supreme Court, to assume the prerogative of deciding the causes which those inferior courts may decide after Congress has organized them; and this position is so absurd that a mere statement of it must, to the mind of the honorable Senator himself, lead to a refutation of his proposition.

Congress has no power to make a citizen.

Every particle of power which Congress has on the subject is to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. When Congress has established that uniform rule of naturalization—which it has done, and the power has been exercised under the Government almost from its foundation—the authority of Congress is exhausted; it has no further power whatever over the question of naturalization or citizenship.

I conceded the other day that the treaty-making power, when it acquired foreign territory with inhabitants, and those inhabitants chose to remain on and after the transfer of the territory to the United States, was, by necessary implication, clothed with the faculty of making a citizen. When the Constitution itself has said by express words and by necessary implication how citizens may be made, when the Constitution has provided that they can be made only in two ways, I assume it as an undoubted constitutional principle that they cannot be made in any other. They may be made by treaty acquiring territory with inhabitants, or they may be made according to the uniform rule of naturalization which Congress is authorized by the Constitution to establish; and they cannot be made in any other way.

It has been assumed here by various gentlemen, and I believe by my learned and most respected friend from Maryland, that any person, be he of what race or color he may, born within the United States, is by the effect and operation of our Constitution made a citizen. If that principle be true now, it was always true since the adoption of the Constitution, it is true in relation to the Indian, it is true in relation to the negro, it is true in relation to the slave negro as well as the free negro. There were free negroes born in the New England States and in Pennsylvania and New York seventy or eighty years ago. When was it ever before claimed in the Senate of the United States, or anywhere in this broad land, for those negroes born from free negro parents, that they were citizens?

Mr. JOHNSON. It was not only claimed, but the Supreme Court in the decision of the Dred Scott case necessarily conceded that if there had been at any time, now or when the Constitution was adopted, an African who came to the United States in a different capacity from a slave, or who was the descendant of one who did come otherwise than as a slave, he would be a citizen.

Mr. DAVIS. Will my honorable friend point out to me the distinction and the constitutional rule that makes a distinction between a free negro and a slave negro?

Mr. JOHNSON. I give you what the court said.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, that is a dictum. The honorable Senator, as I said the other day, is one of the ablest lawyers, and I believe the ablest living lawyer in the land. I have seen gentlemen sometimes so much the lawyer that they had to abate some of the statesman, [laughter;] and I am not certain, I would not say it was so—I will not arrogate to myself to say so—but sometimes a suspicion flashes across my mind that that is precisely the predicament of my honorable friend. My honorable friend knows that when an opinion is rendered by a court, the opinion is authority only upon the question before the court, the question coram judice. It has often been said, and I am not certain that the incumbent of the Chair [Mr. HOWE] and all the gentlemen on the Republican side of the Senate have not assumed again and again that Lord Mansfield, in the celebrated case of Sommersett, decided that slavery did not and could not exist in England. He decided no such principle. He decided diametrically the reverse. He decided that slavery then existed in England, that slaves then might be sold, and if sold for a price to be paid in the future, the sale was a sufficient consideration to maintain the writing and to maintain a suit upon the writing in any of the courts of Westminster Hall. He decided expressly that slavery existed in every English colony in America, that slavery then existed in England, that property in slaves was then recognized in England, and that the sale of slaves was a good and sufficient consideration to uphold a contract and a suit and a recovery upon that contract in Westminster Hall. And what did he decide? He simply decided nothing else but this: that there were laws in England passed by Parliament that were incompatible with the owner of Sommersett taking him forcibly from England back to a slave colony in the West Indies; that these laws required him to issue a writ of habeas corpus discharging Sommersett from the ship in which he was held a prisoner with the purpose of being transported to one of the British West India islands. He decided, furthermore, that but for those laws, which were incompatible with that amount of restraint and coercion which the owner of Sommersett was endeavoring to exercise over him, he would not have granted the writ of habeas corpus, and it would have been impossible to do so. If any gentleman will read that case, he will find that Lord Mansfield stated that there were fifteen thousand slaves at that time on the island of England; fifteen thousand Africans held in slavery, estimated by him to have been worth £700,000; and he states in the clearest and most explicit language that if any of those fifteen thousand slaves were sold in England and a note executed for the price, the sale would be a good and sufficient consideration to maintain the contract and to authorize a judgment upon that contract before him, or before any of the courts of the kingdom.

But I go on; I beg pardon for this digression. I maintain that a negro cannot be made a citizen by Congress; he cannot be made a citizen by any naturalization laws, because the naturalization laws apply to foreigners alone. No man can shake the legal truth of that position. They apply to foreigners alone; and a negro, an Indian, or any other person born within the United States, not being a foreigner, cannot be naturalized; therefore they cannot be made citizens by the uniform rule established by Congress under the Constitution, and there is no other rule. Congress has no power, as I said before, to naturalize a citizen. They could not be made citizens by treaty. If they are made so at all, it is by their birth, and the locality of their birth, and the general operation and effect of our Constitution. If they are so made citizens, that question is a judicial question, not a legislative question. Congress has no power to enlarge or extend any of the provisions of the Constitution which bear upon the birth or citizenship of negroes or Indians born in the United States. All the provisions, all the principles, all the rights which the Constitution established in relation to those matters are fixed, immutable as the Constitution itself, and Congress by no ancillary legislation can enlarge the effect or the operation of any of those provisions or principles of the Constitution or of any rights that could be claimed under them. Then, if a negro is a citizen of the United States at all, he is a citizen by birth and by operation of the Constitution, and his rights are not to be increased or fortified, nor can they be weakened or restricted or diminished by congressional legislation. He holds them by a higher warrant than any law of Congress. He holds them by the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution cannot be interpreted even, much less can it be expanded or restricted by a law of Congress.

What, then, does my amendment propose? It incorporates the provision of the Constitution relative to the rights of a citizen in one State in other States; it recognizes those rights, and declares that they exist under and according to the terms and language of that clause of the Constitution, and it then adopts the penal sanction which the honorable Senator from Illinois has provided in his bill, and it declares that any person who deprives any citizen whatever of any rights under that clause of the Constitution commits a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to the penalties denounced by the bill.

Mr. President, if there was any despot in Europe or in the world that wanted a master architect in framing and putting together a despotic and oppressive law, I would, if my slight voice could reach him, by all means say to him, seek the laboratory of the Senator from Illinois. If he has not proved himself an adept in this kind of legislation, unconstitutional, unjust, oppressive, iniquitous, unwise, impolitic, calculated to keep forever a severance of the Union, to exclude from all their constitutional rights, privileges, and powers under the Government eleven States of the Union—if he has not devised such a measure as that, I have not reason enough to comprehend it. What does it do?

It attempts to confer, by the first section, upon all the inhabitants of the United States, of every race and color, wheresoever resident in them, the right to make and enforce contracts; to sue, be parties, and give evidence; to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property; and the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property; and it exempts them from all punishment, pains, and penalties except such as are common and uniform to all the people. If that is not centralizing with a vengeance and by wholesale, I do not know what is. Here the honorable Senator in one short bill breaks down all the domestic systems of law that prevail in all the States, so far not only as the negro, but as any man without regard to color is concerned, and he breaks down all the penal laws that inflict punishment or penalty upon all the people of the States except so far as those laws shall be entirely uniform in their application. To the extent that there is any variance in those laws, this short bill breaks them down. To the extent that a negro is by them subjected to a severer punishment than a white man, this short bill repeals all the penal laws of the States. In relation to the citizens of a State, to their rights, privileges, and immunities, as they are to be claimed within that State now and forever, it proposes to do exactly what all these authorities say Congress cannot do, because they say in the most distinct terms that the citizens of each State, so far as their rights are limited by the boundary of that State, so far as their property and contracts are limited to that State, so far as penalties and punishments are limited to acts done within that State, are exclusively the subjects of State legislation, and Congress has no power whatever to legislate in relation to them.

The second section declares all persons who shall subject or cause to be subjected any person to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by the first section to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and that the punishment shall be a fine not exceeding $1,000 and imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, one or both, at the discretion of the court.

I have before me the law of the Senator's own State, which makes it a highly penal offense for any officer who is authorized to issue a marriage license to issue a license for the marriage of a white person and a negro. I need not read the law. It makes it a highly penal offense for any preacher of the gospel to solemnize such a marriage. What does the gentleman's bill do? If the clerk issues such a license and the license is consummated by a preacher marrying the negro with the white person, the negro has incurred a penalty by the laws of Illinois for which he may be prosecuted. Suppose the negro is indicted for this offense, and he is tried by a jury and convicted, and the judge sentences him to the penalty denounced by the law, what application, then, has the honorable Senator's bill? All the parties who were engaged in bringing this negro to a punishment to which a white person who had committed the same act would not be—the grand jury, the petit jury, the judge, and the officer of the law who is about to carry the judgment of the court into execution, would all, according to the honorable Senator's bill, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and each of them would be subject to a fine of not exceeding $1,000 and imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, one or both, at the discretion of the court. Does the honorable Senator think such a law would be constitutional and valid in relation to parties who had been born in the State of Illinois, and who were living there?

Let me put the case from my own State, which I mentioned when the other bill was pending. By the law of my State a negro who commits a rape upon a white woman is subject to death, as he ought to be; and he ought to die, and I hope he always will die for any such offense. When that offense is committed by a white man, it is punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term of years. What does the Senator's bill say? That any man or any court or any officer of the law who presumes to inflict upon a negro a different punishment than that to which a white man is subject for the same act, shall himself be regarded as an offender against the law, liable to pay a penalty of $1,000, or to imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, or both, at the discretion of the court. Does the honorable Senator mean to assume the position that the State of Kentucky has not the right to punish a negro who has committed that enormous offense by death, when it punishes a white man who commits it by a different mode and different degree of punishment? Does he say that the judges and officers who are sworn to uphold the constitution of the State of Kentucky, and to enforce her laws, by carrying this law into operation can be guilty of a high misdemeanor against the Government of the United States that shall subject them to the pains and penalties of his bill? Sir, it is preposterous, it is absurd and unsound to the last degree. The Congress of the United States have no right to take jurisdiction over such a case or the parties to such a transaction. They have no right to declare and to denounce such punishment against the State courts and State officers for thus executing the constitutions and penal laws of the States.

These are only examples. The cases would occur every day; they would be more numerous than the fleeting minutes. The cases of wrong and outrage would be innumerable upon the reserved rights of the States, upon their powers to legislate for their own domestic concerns, in relation to their own people, the punishment of their own people, the property and estates and transactions and contracts of their own people. All these subjects belong to the States exclusively, and Congress cannot, without usurpation and a violation of the Constitution, interfere with them. The cases of offense and misdemeanor that in these respects the honorable Senator's bill would bring up every day in the United States would be as numerous as the passing minutes. The result would be to utterly subvert our Government; it would be wholly incompatible with its principles, with its provisions, or with its spirit. It would leave the General Government no longer a limited Government of delegated authority, with no powers except those expressly or by necessary implication given to it by the Constitution. It would produce a perfect and despotic central consolidated Government. All the State governments and State constitutions would be brought in ruins prostrate to the feet of the oligarchy of Congress—an oligarchy more despotic than that of the Council of Five Hundred or the Council of Ten of Venice, or any other council of despotism that ever was organized.

The bill is outrageous. I am amazed that any man of intelligence who has read law can shut his eyes against its enormous unconstitutionality. The men who do so, if they are honest, are forgetting their knowledge of the Constitution; and they have only to let that disease of forgetfulness go a little further, and they will know nothing at all about it.

Section three provides that all suits brought in State courts that come within the purview of the previous sections may be removed into the Federal courts. See what an enormous, oppressive provision of the honorable Senator's bill that is. Here is a suit in a State court between parties who are resident in the State, who have never had residence out of it, about a transaction that has transpired wholly within the State. Who has the right, what power has the right, to prescribe a code to regulate such matters, and to try the parties? The State, no authority but the State. Congress has no power over such parties and over such subjects of suit—not a particle. Your own courts have so decided; the Constitution so reads; reason cannot doubt the truth of that position. All such cases and contracts and persons are exclusively within the control of State authority, State law, and State courts; and yet where those State laws and those State courts are resorted to for the redress of such wrongs, your act comes in and most unjustly and unconstitutionally and oppressively provides for the removal of all such cases into the Federal courts.

The fourth section requires the United States attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals, to institute both penal proceedings and civil suits, in the names of persons who may be injured by any violations of the letter of this act, at the cost of the United States, and authorizes the United States courts to appoint commissioners without limit in point of number, to enforce this act. What is the effect of that? This is an act for the benefit of the free negro, not the white man. If there had been no free negro, this act never would have been heard of. What does it provide? If, according to the letter of this unconstitutional, void, and iniquitous act, a free negro's rights are infringed, the attorneys and marshals of the United States are required to institute both civil and penal proceedings for the benefit of the negro, to bring a criminal prosecution on behalf of the United States, and also a suit in the name of the negro, against the white officers who infringe his rights under this act, and these suits, civil and penal, are to be prosecuted for the benefit of the negro at the cost of the Treasury of the United States. Sir, when was the white man so favored by congressional legislation? When did the learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary introduce a bill that, where the rights of a white man were impugned or violated, it should be the duty of the attorneys and the marshals and the deputy marshals of the United States both to prosecute penal and to sue civilly in the name of the negro for his violated rights, and to sue at the cost of the Treasury of the United States? It is a most diabolical feature.

Section five vests these commissioners with judicial powers to enforce the act. I have read repeatedly from the Constitution of the United States the express and emphatic words that all the judicial power of the Government is vested in the Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish; but here the honorable Senator's bill authorizes the courts of the United States to appoint commissioners without number, legions of them. The names of these commissioners are not submitted to the Senate of the United States for confirmation. They are not courts, they are no part of the judicial branch of the Government; they are not officers nominated by the President and approved of and consented to by the Senate; they are appointed by the will, the dictum of the courts. In times of heated political presidential contests the Executive may cover the face of the country with them, and these men might go on, against the Constitution of the United States, exercising judicial power under this lawless and unconstitutional act, controlling the voters of the land, imprisoning and fining, or bringing up for imprisonment and fine, and other modes of punishment, all the contumacious, all the free citizens of America that would not vote according to their behest. And this enormous power of creating such a numerous tribe of myrmidons with despotic power is vested by this bill in the courts, and these officials are to exercise judicial powers!

The sixth section requires the marshals and deputy marshals to execute all processes issuing in virtue of this act, under the penalty of $1,000, and authorizes the commissioners to call to the aid of such marshals and deputy marshals the bystanders, the posse comitatus, and then the Army and the Navy of the United States. Yes, sir, here is a law made almost eo nomine, made unquestionably for the benefit of the free negro and in violation of the Constitution, and the marshals are required, under the penalty of $1,000 for every instance of defalcation, to execute the process under this void and unconstitutional law, and if they fail to do so the commissioner is authorized by this most monstrous and abominable bill to summon every bystander to aid the marshal in the execution of this unconstitutional law, to summon the posse comitatus of the county in which the process is to be executed to aid in it, and, if necessary, to summon the entire Army and Navy of the United States to execute such void process.

When, sir, was such partiality ever shown for the white man, the sovereign, citizen, and lord of this land—him who made the Government, who won its independence, who established, as he thought, the deep and firm foundations of a free Government in a written Constitution, and whose mission it is to uphold and to defend that Government for himself and for his latest posterity? When was such partial, unjust, and iniquitous legislation devised for the white man who achieved all this good for his country and for the world? Never, never. But the negro and his insane friends bring up now for the first time such monstrous legislation.

There is another most remarkable feature. All persons who violate the rights of the negro under this act are subjected by it to two penalties of $1,000 each, one for the benefit of the United States, and the other for the benefit of the injured negro in the form of liquidated damages. The honorable Senator knows what liquidated damages are, and so does every lawyer. When damages are liquidated they are no longer a penalty or in the nature of a penalty. When they are liquidated by the law, the whole of the nominal amount may be collected without regard to the heinousness of the case in which they are due. Here now is an act that creates two separate penalties on a defaulting officer. If the officer assumes not to execute the process because it is void, being under an unconstitutional law, he is subjected to two penalties. The honorable Senator must be a lineal descendant of Draco of old. He imposes two penalties of $1,000 each, one for the benefit of the United States, and the other for the benefit of the free negro whose rights, according to the letter of this monstrous and unconstitutional law, have been violated; and the penalty in favor of the free negro is assessed in the form of liquidated damages, and the mandate of the court goes inexorably to the marshal to pay to the negro his $1,000 liquidated damages. The contest may be about a cow, or a month's work, or some other trifle of no significance; the white man may be right and the negro wrong; the whole proceeding may be void; but without regard to these questions, the marshal is inexorably to execute the writ; and if he is guilty of any defalcation, any neglect in the energetic pursuit of the party named in the process, he incurs two penalties of $1,000 each. That to the Government of the United States may be ameliorated; the President may remit it; or it may be decided by the courts that the real amount of damage sustained by the negro, and not the penalty, is the criterion of the recovery against the marshal for the first $1,000; but no such mitigation or defense can be brought up for the second. The second is for the benefit of the negro. No law relaxes when the penalty is for the benefit of the negro. No law can be mitigated by justice, by mercy, or by humanity, when its enforcement is for the benefit of the negro; it is as unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, and as inexorable as tyranny itself.

The eighth section of this bill gives a fee to the commissioner of ten dollars in every case and five dollars to the marshal for every arrest. The ninth section makes the courts of the United States and all their officers and paraphernalia tributary to the execution of this law, and the tenth section provides for the use of the Army and the Navy and the militia to carry out this execution of justice to the negro.

Mr. President, was it for these fruits and these laws that we went into this war? Was it for these fruits and these laws and these oppressions that two million and a quarter of men were ordered into the field? Was it that the American people might enjoy these as the fruits of the triumphant close of this war that hundreds of thousands of them have been mutilated on the battle-field and by the diseases of the camp, and that a debt of four or five thousand million dollars has been left upon the country? If these are to be the results of the war, better that not a single man had been marshaled in the field nor a single star worn by one of our officers. These military gentlemen think they have a right to command and control everywhere. They do it. They think they have a right to do it here, and we are sheep in the hands of our shearers. We are dumb.

Mr. President, I do not know how soon, for my action on the present occasion, I shall be compelled to silence by the military power of my country, by the men who ought to be subordinate to the civil power. When the Father of his Country surrendered his military commission, his proudest and most glorious boast was that he had always kept the military subordinate to the civil power. Times have changed. The military power is now rampant and triumphant, and all we have to do is to bow our heads. But I live in the hope that a better day is coming, when the proudest military man in the land, with all his bloody laurels, will find that he is but an instrument in the hands of the law, and that he has to yield the same submission to the law that the humblest citizen of the land does.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I will occupy a very few moments of the attention of the Senate after this long harangue of the Senator from Kentucky, which he closed by declaring that we are dumb in the presence of military power. If he has satisfied the Senate that he is dumb, I presume he has satisfied the Senate of all the other positions he has taken; and the others are just about as absurd as that declaration. He denounces this bill as "outrageous," "most monstrous," "abominable," "oppressive," "iniquitous," "unconstitutional," "void."

Now, what is this bill that is obnoxious to such terrible epithets? It is a bill providing that all people shall have equal rights. Is not that abominable? Is not that iniquitous? Is not that most monstrous? Is not that terrible on white men? [Laughter.] When was such legislation as this ever thought of for white men?

Sir, this bill applies to white men as well as black men. It declares that all persons in the United States shall be entitled to the same civil rights, the right to the fruit of their own labor, the right to make contracts, the right to buy and sell, and enjoy liberty and happiness; and that is abominable and iniquitous and unconstitutional! Could anything be more monstrous or more abominable than for a member of the Senate to rise in his place and denounce with such epithets as these a bill, the only object of which is to secure equal rights to all the citizens of the country, a bill that protects a white man just as much as a black man? With what consistency and with what face can a Senator in his place here say to the Senate and the country that this is a bill for the benefit of black men exclusively when there is no such distinction in it, and when the very object of the bill is to break down all discrimination between black men and white men?

Now sir, what becomes of all the Senator's denunciation? The bill is applicable exclusively to civil rights. It does not propose to regulate the political rights of individuals; it has nothing to do with the right of suffrage, or any other political right; but is simply intended to carry out a constitutional provision, and guaranty to every person of every color the same civil rights. That is all there is to it. That is the only feature of the bill, and all its provisions are aimed at the accomplishment of that one object.

But, says the Senator, it breaks down the local legislation of all the States; it consolidates the power of the States in the Federal Government. Why, sir, if the State of Kentucky makes no discrimination in civil rights between its citizens, this bill has no operation whatever in the State of Kentucky. Are all the rights of the people of Kentucky gone because they cannot discriminate and punish one man for doing a thing that they do not punish another for doing? The bill draws to the Federal Government no power whatever if the States will perform their constitutional obligations.

But the Senator occupies an hour of his speech to show that certain cases which I thought proper to refer to in a few remarks, the other day, in order to ascertain what was meant by the term "citizen of the United States," have no application to the rights of a citizen in a State. Those cases, he says, were based upon that clause of the Constitution which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, and they relate entirely to the rights which a citizen in one State has on going into another State, and not to the rights of the citizens belonging to the State. I never denied that. I would have told the Senator in one moment that the cases were not introduced for any such purpose as he supposes, but they were introduced for the purpose of ascertaining, if we could, by judicial decision what was meant by the term "citizen of the United States;" and inasmuch as there had been judicial decisions upon this clause of the Constitution, in which it had been held that the rights of a citizen of the United States were certain great fundamental rights, such as the right to life, to liberty, and to avail one's self of all the laws passed for the benefit of the citizen to enable him to enforce his rights; inasmuch as this was the definition given to the term as applied in that part of the Constitution, I reasoned from that, that when the Constitution had been amended and slavery abolished, and we were about to pass a law declaring every person, no matter of what color, born in the United States a citizen of the United States, the same rights would then appertain to all persons who were clothed with American citizenship. That was the object for which those cases were introduced. The Senator seemed to suppose, and argued to show what no one would controvert, that they were not cases deciding upon the rights of the citizen in the State in which he resided.

But the Senator goes on to say that there is no such thing as naturalizing a person except he be a foreigner; that there is no authority in the Congress of the United States to declare a person a citizen except it be by way of naturalizing a foreigner. I have already said that in my opinion birth entitles a person to citizenship, that every free-born person in this land is, by virtue of being born here, a citizen of the United States, and that the bill now under consideration is but declaratory of what the law now is; but, inasmuch as some persons deny this, I thought it advisable to declare it in terms in the statute itself. But, sir, this is not the first time that this has been done. If the Senator from Kentucky had read the statutes of his country he would have ascertained that persons had been made citizens by act of Congress three score years and more ago. As long ago as 1802 the Congress of the United States declared that the children of persons naturalized in this country, if the children were under age, should become citizens of the United States. Without going through any process of naturalization at all, they were declared by act of Congress to be citizens of the country.

Again, sir, in 1843, Congress declared:

"That the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, and each and every one of them, shall be deemed to be, and are hereby declared to be, citizens of the United States to all intents and purposes, and shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens, and shall in all respects be subject to the laws of the United States."

That was in 1843. These Stockbridge Indians were born within the United States, and Congress declared by an act that without going through any process of naturalization they were and should be citizens of the United States, with all the rights pertaining to citizens.

This, sir, I believe answers the whole speech of the Senator. I think it was made up of statements that there was no precedent for an act of this kind, which is contradicted by a reference to the laws of denunciations—

Mr. DAVIS. I did not say that there was no precedent for it. I said expressly yesterday that in my opinion the precedents were inadvertently passed, and that at any rate they were outside of the power of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator chooses to regard everything to be outside of the power of Congress by denouncing it as such. As I said, his speech is made up of these denunciations, piling up adjectives, and denouncing as outrageous a bill which contains but one single principle, and that to establish equality in the civil rights of citizens of the country, and in reading from decisions to controvert a point which nobody had made before the Senate.

He also brings up again the question of marriage between whites and negroes. He is troubled about amalgamation, and becomes excited and vehement in talking about it. I should have supposed that at his time of life he would feel protected against it without any law to put him in the penitentiary if he should commit it. [Laughter.] Sir, we need no law of the kind where there is no disposition for this amalgamation. I apprehend that if the States prefer to pass laws on that subject—and I have answered that question two or three times—

Mr. DAVIS. Why did your own State pass such a law?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does not the Senator from Kentucky know that we have a great many Kentuckians in Illinois? [Laughter.] A great many of his people settled nearly the whole of the lower part of my State, and as they came over from under such a law and had to be restrained at home, we were afraid to risk them when they got into Illinois. [Laughter.] But, sir, now that Egypt is redeemed, I do not think there will be any necessity for continuing that act in my State. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the hour having arrived when we agreed to vote upon this bill, without taking up further time, I trust the Senate will take action upon it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand that the hour has arrived when the Senate agreed to take a vote on this bill. The understanding was that the general debate upon the bill should close at three o'clock, and then amendments should be offered and discussed, and the vote taken at four o'clock. Pursuant to that understanding, I propose as an amendment to strike out the last section of the bill, which I will ask the Secretary to report to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator is quite right in his understanding. I will state to him, however, that we are still in Committee of the Whole, and the committee's amendments have not been acted upon. The Senator can propose his amendment at any time, but it would be more regular perhaps to pass upon the amendments that have been made in the committee first.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will first discuss this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Howe in the chair.) The Chair is informed that all the amendments of the committee have been agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and the question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, to strike out the whole of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert a substitute.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What I wish to say is upon the amendment that I propose, and the connection of this section with the rest of the bill. I understand that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] wishes to submit some observations on the bill generally, and of course the Senate will desire to hear him, and I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I have a very distinct—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow the Chair to inquire if the amendment moved by the Senator from Indiana is withdrawn?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not withdraw the amendment. I wish to submit some remarks upon it after the Senator from Kentucky shall have concluded.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I have a very distinct conviction in my mind that this bill is not warranted by the Constitution and is not warranted by good policy and sound statesmanship; but at this hour I cannot do justice to the subject nor to myself by going into it. However, I will make a few remarks to satisfy the gentleman from Illinois that my objections to this bill are well founded, and such as I believe in, and such as I believe the country will come to.

It is now nine months since the war has ceased. The rebellion has been crushed. The adoption of the amendment to the Constitution by the requisite number of States has been announced by the only authority that had the right to announce it, the Secretary of State. But before it was announced this bill was concocted, not exactly in its present form, and it has been progressive, changing like the chameleon.

Now, what is the pretense for the passage of the bill? It is found in the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, in these words:

"Neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in the United States, or in any place subject to their jurisdiction."

The nation has accepted that amendment; it is the language of the nation. My doctrine is that slavery exists no longer in this country; that it is impossible to exist in the face of that provision; and with slavery fell the laws of all the States providing for slavery—every one of them. I do not see what benefit can arise from repealing them by this bill, because if they are not repealed by the Constitution as amended, this bill could not repeal them. I hope that all the States in which slavery formerly existed will accept that constitutional provision in good faith. I myself accept it in good faith. Believing that all the laws authorizing slavery have fallen, I have advised the people of Kentucky, and I would advise all the States, to put these Africans upon the same footing that the whites are in relation to civil rights. They have all the rights that were formerly accorded to the free colored population in all the States just as fully this day as they will have after this bill has passed, and they will continue to have them.

Now, to the States belong the government of their own population, and those within their borders, upon all subjects. We, in Kentucky, prescribe punishment for those who violate the laws; we prescribe it for the white population; we prescribe it for the free African population, and we prescribe it for the slave population. All the laws prescribing punishment for slaves fell with slavery, and they were subject afterward only to the penalties which were inflicted upon the free colored population, they then being free. Slaves, for many offenses, were punished far less than the free colored people. No slave was sent to the penitentiary and punished for stealing or anything of that kind, whereas a free person was. But all these States will now, of course, remodel their laws upon the subject of offenses. I would advise that there should be but one code for all persons, black as well as white: that there shall be one general rule for the punishment of crime in the different States. But, sir, the States must have time to act on the subject; and yet we are here preparing laws and penalties, and proposing to carry them into execution by military authority, before the States have had time to legislate, and even before some of their Legislatures have had time to convene. I think the States of this Union are entitled to some little consideration before you inflict military government upon them, which this bill does. The first section of this bill attempts to repeal all the State laws and to enact new laws for them, the enforcement of which is put in new hands; and the fourth section creates an army of informers and spies to seek out those who offend against this law, and to prosecute them at the expense of the United States. The pretense for passing such a measure as this is found in the second section of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and which declares that—

"Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Sir, the American people are the most law-abiding people on the face of the earth. If there was an attempt to enslave an African after the passage of this constitutional amendment, the writ of habeas corpus would relieve him, and as soon as the courts had declared the law on this subject there would be a general obedience to it. Those individual cases of outrage and wrong that no Government can provide against might occasionally occur and no doubt would occur. Now, is it fair to these States that we should take them up on suspicion and put them under a military despotism in order to enforce this law? According to my understanding of the Constitution of the United States and the sense of the people who adopted this constitutional amendment, they never intended to turn over the State governments and subject them to the dominion of Congress.

Now, what is the result of this bill? It enforces through its own officers and through its own agents a prosecution of the citizens who infract it, or commit what they suppose is an infraction of it, in favor of the black population, and in favor of the black population only; taking it for granted throughout that the wrong is on the side of the white man alone; making no provision for prosecuting a black man for any crime that he may commit against a white man. I say it never was the intention of the Constitution that these States should be subject to Congress; that we should have one set of officers prosecuting the white man, and the officers of the State prosecuting the colored man for offenses committed by him. Under the pretense of giving effect to the freedom of the slave, you have originated a system that is constantly interfering with the laws of the States, and constantly interfering with the citizens of the States, bringing them before your tribunals and questioning them whenever they attempt to enforce a State law against a black man.

Sir, if I know myself, I am determined, in carrying out the amendment to the Constitution, to do as equal justice to the black man as to the white man in all respects; but I am not willing to believe, and I do not believe, that there is any authority under it to overturn the State governments, and permitting the Federal Government to run into the States to make laws on this subject when it enters into the States for nothing else. I tell you, gentlemen, it is my firm conviction that it can lead to nothing but strife and ill-feeling, which will grow and continue to grow. Where it will end, God only knows. The time will not always be that the citizens will be content that the State governments should be interfered with, and that there should be in each State two sets of police officers, one to punish those who commit what they presume to be offenses against the Africans, and another to punish the African for his crimes under the State laws, and that punishment should be made the pretense of prosecuting the white man in your courts. The thing will not work; it ought not to work; and it never should have been introduced here. It is not necessary to secure the freedom of the African. Slavery does not exist. The ordinary process and proceeding of law is ample for his protection. But when you overturn the State governments, interfere by your legislation with their laws, supersede their courts, keep up a constant contention between the individuals and the tribunals, you are destroying the unity of this Government, and the purposes for which the States were formed.

In this simple view of the subject, I consider that there is no warrant in the Constitution for such legislation as this, and it is impossible that there should be, and besides, it will be the most impolitic law that ever was passed. The gentleman from Illinois says that this is simply a bill providing that all persons shall have their rights. I might return the compliment by saying that it is simply a bill declaring that we have established a military despotism and the laws are to be enforced at the point of the bayonet. This bill and the one passed last week invoke military power everywhere, and throw the protection of the military over anything. Gentlemen, is this a proper answer to this war, to the gallantry of our officers and soldiers, and to the hope of the American people that we should have a restored Union? Is it a proper answer to those who have lent you their money and whom you yet owe, to sow this cause of dissension between the States, this pestering interference that will lead to dissension, and God knows what else it will lead to? I say that this bill, as well as the kindred measure passed last week, should not be passed on account of economy. It should not be passed on account of your creditors. How many creditors have you now knocking at your doors for money and property seized and put into your Treasury, whom you cannot pay, whom you are afraid to make appropriations for? And yet you are taking by these bills more money from the Treasury than would pay probably the principal of the debt due to these men. Is it just to the creditors to whom you owe this money that you should leave their claims unsettled, and that you should attempt to carry on this Government by such legislation as this?

Gentlemen, I am not going to inflict a long speech upon you. Kentucky has had her share of talking here, and, sir, she has had her share of suffering during this war. At one time she was invaded by three armies of the rebellion; all but seven or eight counties of the State at one time were occupied by its armies, and her whole territory devastated by guerrillas. We have suffered in this war. We have borne it as best we could. We feel it intensely that now, at the end of the war, we should be subjected to a military despotism, our houses liable to be entered at any time when our families are at rest, by military men who can arrest and send to prison without warrant, and we are obliged to go, and we are obliged to pay any fines they may impose. I do not believe that you will lose anything if you pause before passing such legislation as this, and establishing these military despotisms, for we do not know where they are to end.

Gentlemen, I will not detain you any longer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not agree with some Senators that this is a more dangerous bill to the country than the one that was passed last week. If the amendment which I have proposed should be adopted and the last section stricken from the bill, it will be a much less dangerous bill, in my judgment, than the Freedmen's Bureau bill, for the reason that that bill sends an army of irresponsible officers among the people to control their affairs, and from their actions and their decisions there is no appeal to the courts; but this bill sends the people with their causes into the courts of the United States, and if a great wrong be done in any of the inferior courts perhaps an appeal will lie to a court where justice will be done. I am not so much afraid of any law that sends the people to the courts as I am of a law which places them under the control and power of irresponsible officials.

But the section which I propose to strike out is an unnecessary and very dangerous one, and I submit it to the judgment of the majority of this body whether it ought to be enacted into a law. This bill is a wasp; its sting is in its tail. Sir, what is the bill? It provides, in the first place, that the civil rights of all men, without regard to color, shall be equal; and, in the second place, that if any man shall violate that principle by his conduct, he shall be responsible to the court; that he may be prosecuted criminally and punished for the crime, or he may be sued in a civil action and damages recovered by the party wronged. Is not that broad enough? Do Senators want to go further than this? To recognize the civil rights of the colored people as equal to the civil rights of the white people, I understand to be as far as Senators desire to go; in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to place all men upon an equality before the law; and that is proposed in regard to their civil rights.

Then, sir, we have the framework for the execution of these two sections. I recollect that during the holidays it was heralded to the country that a great achievement was to be expected from the Senator from Illinois; that he was going to introduce a bill as soon as Congress reassembled recognizing the civil rights of the colored people as equal to the civil rights of the white people; that he was going to so frame his bill as that these rights should be positively and certainly secure, and that to accomplish this he had adopted the framework and the fashion of the former fugitive slave law. That was regarded as a great achievement, and much credit was claimed for the Senator because when he came to prosecute and follow white men he had adopted the language and the framework of a law which was intended to recapture runaway slaves—a law which in its framework and details was denounced as most unjust and dangerous. And yet it was regarded as a feat and an accomplishment for the Senator from Illinois to incorporate into this bill the language of that law:

Why, sir, this bill provides that there shall be commissioners, not ordinary commissioners that the courts in the exercise of their judgment and discretion shall appoint, but extraordinary commissioners, and from its language it seems to contemplate that there shall be a commissioner in every county of the United States, and these commissioners are authorized to appoint as many agents or deputy marshals as they may see fit to appoint, and these deputy marshals may call upon the body of the people, for what purpose? To pursue a runaway white man. Oh, I recollect how the blood of the people was made to run cold within them when it was said that the white man was required to run after the fugitive slave; that the law of 1850 made you and me, my brother Senators, slave-catchers; that the posse comitatus could be called to execute a writ of the law for the recovery of a runaway slave under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; and the whole country was agitated because of it. Now slavery is gone; the negro is to be established upon a platform of civil equality with the white man. That is the proposition. But we do not stop there; we are to reenact a law that nearly all of you said was wicked and wrong; and for what purpose? Not to pursue the negro any longer; not for the purpose of catching him; not for the purpose of catching the great criminals of the land; but for the purpose of placing it in the power of any deputy marshal in any county of the country to call upon you and me, and all the body of the people to pursue some white man who is running for his liberty because some negro has charged him with denying to him equal civil rights with the white man. I thought, sir, that that framework was enough; I thought, when you placed under the command of the marshal in every county of the land all the body of the people, and put every one upon the track of the fleeing white man, that that was enough; but it is not. For the purpose of the enforcement of this law, the President is authorized to appoint somebody who is to have the command of the military and naval forces of the United States—for what purpose? To prevent a violation of this law, and to execute it. Let me read it, as I do not get the words exactly:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of this act.

What violation, sir? The denial of equality to the colored people. Some man disputes the proposition; some judge proposes in his adjudication not to recognize the civil equality of the colored people. Now the military may be called in to prevent the violation of this law. Before there is a violation, before a crime is committed, the military may be brought to bear upon any person who is charged with a design to violate the law. Then if there shall be a violation, if some judge of a court shall hold that the colored man is not entitled to equal civil rights with the white man, the military force may be called in to execute this law. How and why? Are we not in a time of peace? Where is society now disturbed? Upon our honors we must legislate fairly for the country. We have no right, in the form of legislation, to go to punishing men, and I cannot believe that Senators intend any such thing. If you create an army of officers to execute this law, and if you authorize the deputy marshals everywhere to call upon the whole body of the people to execute it, why is it that the military shall be brought in to execute this law of all the laws of the United States, the only law relating to the civil affairs of the people? Is it right? Are you willing to do it in reference to other laws? Are you willing to say in your laws declaring and protecting the civil rights of white men that they shall be enforced at the point of the bayonet? I know you would not. You would say that the military must not be brought in except where there is an insurrection, or when there is such an interference with the enforcement of the laws as justifies the interposition of the military power of the country.

In the State of Indiana we do not recognize the civil equality of the races. I refer to Indiana, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to his State the other day, as a mere mode of illustration. The policy of that State was to prevent the further immigration of colored people into the State after 1852, and as a means of preventing that we denied to the colored people who might come into the State after that date the right to acquire real estate. Suppose that during the past thirteen years some colored man has come into the State of Indiana and has purchased real estate. He brings his action of ejectment after the passage of this law to recover that land. Our supreme court has decided that law of the State to be constitutional. That decision of the supreme court is the rule of decision for all the inferior courts of the State. The trial of the ejectment comes off before the circuit or common pleas court of the State, and the judge instructs the jury that under the law and constitution of the State of Indiana this man could not acquire an interest in real estate and that he cannot recover. Here is a denial of a civil right, it is claimed; but it is a question of law; and you make that judge not only responsible in the civil but in the criminal courts of the United States for his adjudication. You make him a criminal for following the authority of the supreme court of the State. You make him a criminal because he obeys the constitution of the State. You make him a criminal because he enforces the law of the State as it is plainly written before him. You are not content with capturing him, but you call in the military power of the country and you stop his court. You will not allow that case to go to judgment, but when it is announced to the jury that this is the rule that must govern them, I suppose the military must be brought in to prevent a verdict and a final judgment. That would be preventing a violation of the law. Is this law to make a good title in Indiana? Is this law to have the force of vesting in the colored people who came into that State since 1852 a good and sufficient title to land when the constitution and the law of the State denied that right? You are not content that this judge may be pursued by a host, an army of marshals, and the body of the people, but a military chieftain is to be called in that this may not go into the judgment of the court.

I am giving an extreme case, but it is a case that all Senators will admit might occur under this law. A court may be stopped midway in the investigation of a cause; and to prevent its judgment, the military are authorized to interfere. Do Senators desire that? I thought the time for military government had passed. It may not have passed here, but this military control, I believe, is about passed. I believe, taking the course pursued by the Administration in disbanding the armies, that it has substantially passed at the other end of the avenue, and a desire for its continuance has passed away from the hearts of the people. Two years ago it was a very easy thing anywhere throughout the North to maintain a military force and to repress a public sentiment that was offensive to the authorities in power. It is not so now, sir; and I am very glad of it. I never want to see a return to the time when a man's house may be surrounded by armed men in the night time, and he may be carried off to a distant portion of the State.

Mr. JOHNSON. And out of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And out of the State and cast into a dungeon, and denied that trial which the Constitution and laws of the country have guaranteed to him. I never want to see the time return when a man in the middle of the night shall hear the stealthy tread of the spy at his door, in the forcible language of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] when he shall hear the breathing of the spy at his keyhole; when he shall hear the jingling of false keys at his girdle. If men are guilty of crimes, let them be brought before the courts. Do not you Senators want it to be so? Are there any Senators here that want this to be a country governed by military power? Now, in a time of peace, when the southern armies are abandoned, when the States are rapping at your door for admission, when they wish to be heard when we legislate in regard to them; at this time of profound peace in the country, when there is a more perfect subjugation to law, if I may use that expression, than at any period heretofore, we propose that a law for the benefit of the colored people shall be executed at the point of the bayonet.

It seems to me that I need add nothing further. I repeat that it is enough that you clothe the marshals under this bill with all the powers that were given to the marshals under the fugitive slave law. That was regarded as too rigorous a law, as too arbitrary in its provisions, and you repealed it. You repealed it before the constitutional amendment was adopted. You said it should not stand upon the statute-book any longer, that no man, white or black, should be pursued under the provisions of that law. Now, you reenact it, and you claim it as a merit and as an ornament to the legislation of the country; and you add an army of officers and clothe them with the power to call upon anybody and everybody to pursue the running white man. That is not enough, but you must have the military to be called in, at the pleasure of whom? Such a person as the President may authorize to call out the military forces. Where it shall be, and to whom this power shall be given, we do not know.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the bill. I hope it will not pass; I think it will do no good; but if it must pass, let us not unite the sword with the court.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments at this stage of the proceedings, for I am as anxious to have a vote as any one; but it is perhaps necessary for me to say a few words in explanation of the reasons for the vote I shall give.

My distinguished colleague, if I understand him aright, places his objection to this bill, first, upon the ground that we have pressed into the service the machinery of the fugitive slave law; and secondly, that we authorize this bill to be enforced by the military authority of the United States. It is true that many of the provisions of this bill, changed in their purpose and object, are almost identical with the provisions of the fugitive slave law, and they are denounced by my colleague in their present application; but I have not heard any denunciation from my colleague, or from any of those associated with him, of the provisions of that fugitive slave law which was enacted in the interest of slavery, and for purposes of oppression, and which was an unworthy, cowardly, disgraceful concession to southern opinion by northern politicians. I have suffered no suitable opportunity to escape me to denounce the monstrous character of that fugitive slave act of 1850. All these provisions were odious and disgraceful in my opinion, when applied in the interest of slavery, when the object was to strike down the rights of man. But here the purpose is changed. These provisions are in the interest of freemen and of freedom, and what was odious in the one case becomes highly meritorious in the other. It is an instance of poetic justice and of apt retribution that God has caused the wrath of man to praise Him. I stand by every provision of this bill, drawn as it is from that most iniquitous fountain, the fugitive slave law of 1850.

What possible wrong can be inflicted upon any one by the provisions of this bill? These men are free by a threefold title. They have a threefold claim to their freedom. They are free, first, by the proclamation of the President of the United States. Many of them are free, from having fought during the late rebellion in the Army of the United States, and by the laws of all nations, Christian and savage, and by the usage of all nations, the moment you make them soldiers in your Army you manumit and declare them free. They are free by the constitutional amendment lately enacted, and entitled to all the privileges and immunities of other free citizens of the United States. It is made your especial duty by the second section of that amendment, by appropriate legislation, to carry out that emancipation. If that second section were not embraced in the amendment at all your duty would be as strong, the duty would be paramount, to protect them in all rights as free and manumitted people. I do not consider that the second section of that amendment does anything but declare what is the duty of Congress, after having passed such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to secure them in all their rights and privileges. My distinguished colleague seems to take exception to the term "equality before the law."

What are the objects sought to be accomplished by this bill? That these freedmen shall be secured in the possession of all the rights, privileges, and immunities of freemen; in other words, that we shall give effect to the proclamation of emancipation and to the constitutional amendment. How else, I ask you, can we give them effect than by doing away with the slave codes of the respective States where slavery was lately tolerated? One of the distinguished Senators from Kentucky [Mr. GERRIE] says that all these slave laws have fallen with the emancipation of the slave. That, I doubt not, is true, and by a court honestly constituted of able and upright lawyers, that exposition of the constitutional amendment would obtain.

But why do we legislate upon this subject now? Simply because we fear and have reason to fear that the emancipated slaves would not have their rights in the courts of the slave States. The State courts already have jurisdiction of every single question that we propose to give to the courts of the United States. Why then the necessity of passing the law? Simply because we fear the execution of these laws if left to the State courts. That is the necessity for this provision.

Then my colleague asks, why do you invoke the power of the military to enforce these laws? And he says that constables and sheriffs and marshals when they have process to serve have a right to call upon the posse comitatus, the body of the whole people, to enforce their writs.

Here is a justice of the peace in South Carolina or Georgia, or a county court, or a circuit court, that is called upon to execute this law. They appoint their own marshal, their deputy marshal, or their constable, and he calls upon the posse comitatus. Neither the judge, nor the jury, nor the officer as we believe is willing to execute the law. He may call upon the people, the body of the whole people, a body of rebels steeped in treason and rebellion to their lips, and they are to execute it; and the gentleman seems wonderfully astonished that we should call upon the military power. We should not legislate at all if we believed the State courts could or would honestly carry out the provisions of the constitutional amendment; but because we believe they will not do that, we give the Federal officers jurisdiction. Because we believe they will not do it, because we believe their people will not carry it out, we authorize the President of the United States to do what he would have a perfect right to do without the enactment of such a law under peculiar circumstances. Where organized resistance to the legal authority assumes that shape that the officers cannot execute a writ, they have a right through the Governor of the State to call upon the President to see that that law, as well as every other law, is faithfully executed. We propose by law to say that the military may be called in for the execution of this law.

But to return to the fugitive slave law; how long is it since in Boston, the proud metropolis of New England, the military were called in to execute the fugitive slave law and to suppress a riot growing out of the attempt to enforce it?

I think, then, that the provisions of this bill are admirably calculated to secure to these colored persons their rights under the constitutional amendment, and I think the provision contained in the last section of the bill more important than any other, and that is, that the President shall have a right with the strong arm of military authority to see that this law is carried out; and I say without that provision this act would be a mockery and a farce. It will not be worth the paper upon which it will be engrossed unless you make it a law in deed and in fact, and authorize the judicial officers appointed under it to call upon and to command the military power of the country for the purpose of carrying it out.

But what harm is to result from it? Who is to be oppressed? What white man fleeing, in the language of my colleague, pursued by these harpies of the law, is in danger of having his rights stricken down? What does the bill provide? It places all men upon an equality, and unless the white man violates the law he is in no danger. It takes no right from any white man. It simply places others on the same platform upon which he stands, and if he would invoke the power of local prejudice to override the laws of the country, this is no Government unless the military may be called in to enforce the order of the civil courts and obedience to the laws of the country.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the hour fixed for taking the vote has arrived, but I desire to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments to notice a remark that fell from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE.] The Senator tells us that the emancipated men ought to have their civil rights, that the black codes fell with slavery; but the Senator forgets that at least six of the reorganized States in their new Legislatures have passed laws wholly incompatible with the freedom of these freedmen; and so atrocious are the provisions of these laws, and so persistently are they carried into effect by the local authorities, that General Thomas in Mississippi, General Swayne in Alabama, General Sickles in South Carolina, and General Terry in Virginia have issued positive orders forbidding the execution of the black laws that have just been passed. General Sickles has just issued an order in South Carolina of twenty-three sections, more full, perfect, and complete in their provisions than have ever been issued by any official in the country, for the security of the rights of the freedmen. On the 12th day of January last, General Grant, unquestionably with the approbation of the President of the United States, issued this order to all the commanders of our armies in the rebel States—

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my friend from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question? Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator state what he considers the authority of General Terry to make such an order within the State of Virginia? Where does he get the authority to make such an order as that?

Mr. WILSON. General Terry is in command of the department of Virginia, and Virginia is under martial law, and General Terry, as commander in that State, seeing that the vagrant laws of that State were used to make slaves of men whom we have made free, issued a positive order forbidding the execution of the vagrant laws on that population. I thank General Terry for that order. In North Carolina two men were sold into slavery for years under the vagrant laws, and a military commander in that State interposed, forbade the execution of the sentence, and secured their liberty.

General Grant on the 12th day of January issued this order, doubtless with the approval of the President of the United States and the Secretary of War, as it certainly has the approval of the people of the whole country:

"Military division and department commanders, whose commands embrace or are composed of any of the late rebellious States, and who have not already done so, will at once issue and enforce orders protecting colored persons from prosecution in any of said States charged with offenses for which white persons are not punished in the same manner and degree."

So unjust, so wicked, so incompatible are these new black laws of the rebel States, made in defiance of the expressed will of the nation, that Lieutenant General Grant has been forced to issue that order which sets aside the black laws of all these rebellious States against the freedmen, and allows no law to be enforced against them that is not enforced equally against white men. I think, and I am sure the Senate and the country will thank, the illustrious commander of our armies for commanding the officers of military divisions and departments to issue at once and enforce orders protecting colored persons from prosecution under these inhuman and unchristian enactments. This order issued by General Grant will be respected, obeyed, and enforced in the rebel States with the military power of the nation. Southern legislators and people must learn, if they are compelled to learn by the bayonets of the Army of the United States, that the civil rights of the freedmen must be and shall be respected; that these freedmen are as free as their late masters; that they shall live under the same laws, be tried for their violation in the same manner, and if found guilty punished in the same manner and degree.

This measure is called for because these reconstructed Legislatures, in defiance of the rights of the freedmen and the will of the nation embodied in the amendment to the Constitution, have enacted laws nearly as iniquitous as the old slave codes that darkened the legislation of other days. The needs of more than four million colored men imperatively call for its enactment. The Constitution authorizes and the national will demands it. By a series of legislative acts, by executive proclamations, by military orders, and by the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution by the people of the United States, the gigantic system of human slavery that darkened the land, controlled the policy and swayed the destinies of the Republic, has forever perished. Step by step we have marched right on from one victory to another with the music of broken fetters ringing in our ears. None of the series of acts in this beneficent legislation of Congress, none of the proclamations of the Executive, none of these military orders protecting rights secured by law will ever be revoked or amended by the voice of the American people. There is now

"No slave beneath that starry flag.
The emblem of the free."

By the will of the nation freedom and free institutions for all, chains and fetters for none, are forever incorporated in the fundamental law of regenerated and united America. Slave codes and auction blocks, chains and fetters and bloodhounds are things of the past, and the chattel stands forth a man with the rights and the powers of the freemen. For the better security of these new-born civil rights we are now about to pass the greatest and the grandest act in this series of acts that have emancipated a race and disenthralled a nation. It will pass, it will go upon the statute-book of the Republic by the voice of the American people, and there it will remain. From the verdict of Congress in favor of this great measure no appeal will ever be entertained by the people of the United States.

Mr. COWAN. I had not intended, sir, to say a word further in this discussion, and I only rise now to enter my solemn protest against and my solemn dissent from the doctrines advanced by the honorable Senator from Indiana; and I do so rather from the very high regard I have for him as a man, and the high respect I have for him as a lawyer and a jurist. Had what he said fallen from most other men, I should have contented myself by keeping my seat; but that doctrine coming from him, I feel called upon, and I cannot resist the call, to enter my protest and my dissent.

Sir, I will never agree that the military power of this country shall be substituted for the writ of error or the certiorari. To do so is to substitute a military despotism instead of a civil Government. What is the proposition as understood by both the honorable Senators from Indiana, who have commingled in this debate? There is no doubt, and there can be no dispute about it. It is simply this: by the amendment to the Constitution it is said that the slave codes of the several States have been abolished. Grant it. Nobody ever disputed or denied it, because when there ceases to be slaves there ceases to be a slave code; when the subject-matter is destroyed upon which the law was to operate, the law itself ceases to be.

But this is not a bill simply for the abolition of slave codes. This is a bill for the abolition of all laws in the States which create distinctions between black men and white ones. This is a bill which repeals—

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to ask—

Mr. COWAN. No, sir; in a moment you will have an opportunity to reply, and I do not wish to be cross-examined or harassed during the progress of what little I have to say.

This is a proposition to repeal by act of Congress all State laws, all State legislation, which in any way create distinctions between black men and white men in so far as their civil rights and immunities extend. It is not to repeal legislation in regard to slaves. When there was no such thing as a slave in the land, of course all laws relating to slaves fell with it. I hold—educated in the school in which I have been educated, and it was not that of the strictest constructionists, nor was it in that latitudinarian school which can extract anything from the terms and provisions of the Constitution, but it was in the fair construction school—that no power has ever been delegated to this Government to repeal State legislation, which legislation was confined to the relation of the citizens of the State making the legislation among themselves. I have never known that anybody pretended that it possessed such power. This bill pretends to repeal those laws, to set them at naught; and it pretends moreover to go further, and to make the State officers who attempt to execute those laws criminals, and to punish them criminally, and, if resistance is offered to that punishment, that the military of the United States is to step in and to inflict it. Now I beg Senators to pause, because this legislation not only affects the States lately in rebellion, but it affects all the States; and if it is good with regard to the State of South Carolina it is good with regard to the honorable Senator's own State of Indiana; it is good with regard to the State of Ohio, it is good with regard to my State, and it is good clearly with regard to all the States.

Now, sir, what is the law, and what has been the law in our country, the acknowledged law of the country, the law of the country which allowed to all and afforded to all men everywhere an ample, fit, civil remedy—not a remedy at the point of the bayonet, but a remedy upon the tongue of the advocate and in the judgment of the judge? If we have the power to override State legislation by this bill, it is either constitutional or it is not constitutional. There is the alternative, and either horn of the dilemma may be taken by the advocates of the bill. If it be constitutional the State courts are bound to execute it. But our honorable friend says the State courts will not execute it. Suppose they do not. There have been laws of the Union heretofore which the State courts refused to execute; but I have yet to learn that anybody ever proposed that those courts could be enforced to its execution at the point of the bayonet. What is the rule, then? If the State court decides that the act of Congress which restrains and limits their powers is constitutional, then the State court executes the law, and there is no trouble about it. If that court, however, on the other hand, decides that it is unconstitutional, what then? By the law now, the party injured has his remedy by a writ of error; and the Supreme Court—that civil tribunal set up by the will of the nation as embodied in the Constitution and the laws—is the tribunal to determine whether that appeal is upon just grounds or not. Are we to overthrow everything? Are we going to turn this into a military dictatorship? Are we going to abandon the province of reason and resort entirely to that of force? Are we going to substitute the bayonet and the saber for argument and law and reason? Surely not; and yet that is the proposition.

For the sake of the argument, I will admit that there is a fair dispute as to whether this bill is constitutional or not; and admitting that that is fairly in dispute, I say that at any other time, and under any other circumstances, a bill would have been brought up declaring that those laws should not and ought not to be enforced, and that would have raised the question as to the constitutionality of the measure. If the State court had decided that the law was constitutional, of course then you would have attained your end. If not, as I said before, a writ of error or appeal is the proper remedy by the party injured.

But now look at the proposal. If the State court decides in favor of the State laws, who is to decide whether those State laws are overridden by this general bill? I put the question here and demand an answer, who is to decide that point? Is it a judge learned in the law? Is it a court established by the law? Is it the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest judicial tribunal of the land? No, sir. By the bill, and by the admission of the gentlemen who have argued in favor of it, it is to be determined by the military, and the military are to decide whether the statute in question is overridden by this bill or whether it is not. I ask American Senators and I ask American citizens whether this Government has come to that, or whether it has not.

I had hoped never to stand in this body and hear a Republican Senator, and not only a Republican Senator but Republican Senators excuse and apologize, or rather triumphantly cite the fugitive slave law of 1850 as a model for their present legislation. Sir, if there is a precedent upon our records which above all others ought to be avoided by prudent men, by law-abiding and law-loving men, it is that fugitive slave law of 1850. But it is said the Supreme Court decided that it was constitutional. I grant it, and I submitted and obeyed it because they did so decide, and because we had all agreed that we would submit to their decisions. At the same time it was within the province of every good man, every honest and just man, and every learned lawyer throughout the land, to struggle and strive to have that decision reversed. I do not believe it was constitutional; it never was constitutional. The clause which required the rendition of fugitives from justice, and the clause which required the rendition of fugitive slaves, were in hæc verba, in pari materia, and they ought to be construed in the same way precisely.

What was the law by which the rendition of criminals was provided for between sovereign States? That the reclamation must be made upon the sovereign power of the State in order to restore the alleged criminal. What, then, was intended by the framers of the Constitution? That the reclamation ought to have been made upon the sovereign power of the State to return the fugitive from labor, the one who had owed service in a State and had escaped from it. That was the proper remedy. And, Mr. President, when the slave States themselves met to make their confederacy, they paid perhaps the highest compliment to the Constitution of the United States that was ever paid to any instrument in the world. No rebellion, no insurrection, no separation has occurred heretofore in any country where the separatists or the rebels took the constitution of the country they had left almost literally and adopted it for themselves; and yet the rebels did that, with one exception in regard to the term of the President, which they extended to six years; and with regard to the fugitive slave clause. They put the true construction upon it there, and by a new article of their constitution, they declared that the fugitive was only to be delivered up on reclamation made upon the Governor of the State to which the fugitive had escaped. They thereby ratified, sanctioned, and admitted that the construction contended for by northern men for long, long years of that clause was the true one; so that even southern authority, even slaveholding reason, even the argument which grows out of slavery will not sustain the fugitive slave law as a precedent for anything which we may do here in considering the rights of the States and of the people of the States under this Union.

But, Mr. President, I beg to protest, whenever any inferior court of the United States, any supreme court of a State, or any inferior court of a State, makes a decision which is against a law of the United States, the paramount law, or against the constitutionality of that law, the remedy is not the military; it is not the bayonet; the remedy is an appeal to the superior, the higher tribunals of the country.

The honorable Senator asks, who would be injured by this? As I said before, the relations of the citizens or inhabitants of the several States are peculiarly within the legislation of those States. You heard the other day, sir, that Maryland has an act of her Legislature by which a black man is forbidden to marry a white woman. Is that competent? Is not the State of Wisconsin competent to-day to legislate upon that relation between her citizens? Are not the several States sovereign enough to determine upon this question of miscegenation? Are they not as sovereign to determine upon it as they are upon the question of polygamy, the question of incest, or any other question which it is believed and is thought would materially affect the interests of the community constituting the State?

Now, let us take a case. A black man in Maryland, after the passage of this act, marries a white woman, and he is arraigned under the law of Maryland forbidding it, and the Maryland judge, does what? What would the Maryland judge do? I ask what Senators would do if they were sitting in his place administering the laws of Maryland? Here is an act of Congress which declares that, as to all civil rights and immunities, the negro is to be put upon precisely the same footing as the white man. This judge in Maryland decides that the negro has a right to marry a white woman—that repeals the laws of Maryland; or he decides that a black man has not a right to marry a white woman, and he undertakes to impose upon him the penalties which the Maryland statute provides. What is the remedy of this bill? What is the remedy of my honorable and learned friend from Indiana? It is that the President shall intervene with bayonet and ball in order to do, what? To stop the execution of the decree or sentence of the court of Maryland. Now, I ask—I ask it in all seriousness; I ask it from Senators who are intrusted by the people of the several States with the highest interests known among men—whether that is prudent, politic, lawful, or constitutional? I ask again whether it is not in the face of all the world's experience, from the first line of recorded history down to the present day, that that question, or any such question, should be submitted to the military power of any Government whatever.

There it is; words cannot make it plainer; reason cannot elucidate it; no language can strengthen it or weaken it, one way or the other. There is the question, whether a military man, educated in a military school, accustomed to supreme command, unaccustomed to the administration of civil law among a free people, is to be intrusted with this appellate jurisdiction over the courts of the country; whether he can in any way, whether he ought in any way to be intrusted with such a power? I for my part will never agree to it; and I should feel myself recreant to every duty that I owed to myself, to my country, to my country's history, and I may say to the race which has been for hundreds and thousands of years endeavoring to attain to something like constitutional liberty, if I did not resist this and all similar projects.

I ask you, where is this to end? If this is to be a consolidated Government, if all power is to be concentrated at Washington, if all the powers heretofore reserved to the States are to be given to this Government, let us know it. I am not very certain that, personally, I should have any very great objection to it. One great Government for this great empire might be perhaps cheaper, might perhaps induce a greater homogeneity among the people than the several State governments which exist now; but that is not the question for determination. We sit here by virtue of authority derived from the American people, hedged, limited, circumscribed, and bounded by the terms of the great organic law, the Constitution, and it is not for us to transcend that until the will of our principals in that behalf is known and signified according to the forms in that Constitution laid down for the purpose of making amendments to it. Then, I say, if we are to preserve this form, if this is to be a Union of States, and a Union of States which shall have all the rights reserved that have not been delegated to the General Government, and if that is the theory on which we are to proceed, if the people of the several States in their domestic and civil and political relations are to be regulated by the States, then, certainly, upon no known principle of the law can this bill be justified, and particularly by no known principle of any constitutional law or of any sound reason can the principle of substituting military power for a writ of error be sustained or maintained.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I cannot consent that this bill shall receive the forms of law and content myself with simply recording my vote against it; and I rise now to say that against this and all like legislation I desire to enter the protest of my opinion; and I do so both upon the ground of questions of constitutional law, and also upon those of sound policy. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE,] as to the true interpretation of the Constitution as affecting this bill; and also as to his views with regard to the policy of the reestablishment of harmony throughout the Union. And I agree with my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] upon the question of policy raised by him; also with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] They have fully expressed my views in more apt words and with closer logic than is within the grasp of my intellectual powers. I am content with what they have said, and will not undertake to address the Senate. I merely rise to remark that with them I think this and similar legislation is fraught with infinite mischief both as infringing clearly upon the Constitution and also upon the rules of sound governmental policy.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I was in hopes that we might have come to a vote at an earlier hour than this, but inasmuch as several objections have been recently stated to the bill which were not urged before, I trust I shall be pardoned for occupying the attention of the Senate a very few minutes, and a few minutes only.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] has made a very candid and considerate speech in reference to this bill, placing his objections to it upon the ground of policy; and some of its features he thinks also are not constitutional. If all the people of this country were like the Senator from Kentucky, there would be no occasion for this bill. He says that when slavery was abolished the slave codes in connection with it were abolished, and that he will advise the people of Kentucky to extend the same civil rights to the black population that the white population have. He believes that they are entitled to them. Now, sir, that is all that is provided for by the first section of this bill; he then can have no objection to the first section of the bill, for it simply provides that all the inhabitants of the United States shall be entitled to the same civil rights. That meets the view of the Senator from Kentucky. Why does he object to it? He objects to it because he says the States will do this. I answer to him that if everybody was of the same opinion that he is, and would act upon it, the States would do it, and there would be no occasion for the passage of the bill; but my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has just cited the attention of the Senate to laws passed in half a dozen of the rebellious States under their recent organizations, in which they have discriminated against the negro on account of his color; so that all persons will not do what the Senator from Kentucky says they ought to.

Then what is our duty? Agreeing as I do with him that all slave codes fall with slavery, that it is the duty of the States to wipe out all those laws which discriminate against persons who have been slaves, yet if they will not do it, and Congress has authority to do it under the constitutional amendment, is it not incumbent on us to carry out that provision of the Constitution? That is all we propose to do.

The second section of this bill merely punishes persons who violate what it is admitted they ought not to violate. It does seem to me that there can be no objection to the passage of such a law by Congress on the part of any one who admits that negroes are now entitled to the same rights as white people; and not only that there can be no objection to it but that there is a positive duty upon us to pass such a law if we find discriminations still adhered to in the States where slavery has recently existed.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] objects to the bill because he says that the same provisions which were enacted in the old fugitive slave law are incorporated into this, and that it has been heralded to the country that it was a great achievement to do this, and he insists that if those provisions of law were odious and wicked and wrong which provided for punishing men for aiding the slave to escape, therefore they must be wicked and wrong now when they are employed for the punishing a man who undertakes to put a person into slavery. Sir, that does not follow at all. A law may be iniquitous and unjust and wrong which undertakes to punish another for doing an innocent act, which would be righteous and just and proper to punish a man for doing a wicked act. We have upon our statute-books a law punishing a man who commits murder, because the commission of murder is a high crime, and the party who does it forfeits his right to live; but would it be just to apply the law which punishes a person for committing murder to an innocent person who had killed another accidentally, without malice? That is the difference. It is the difference between right and wrong, between good and evil. True, the features of the fugitive slave law were abominable when they were used for the purpose of punishing, not negroes as the Senator from Indiana says, but white men. The fugitive slave law was enacted for the purpose of punishing white men who aided to give the natural gift of liberty to those who were enslaved. Now, sir, we propose to use the provisions of the fugitive slave law for the purpose of punishing those who deny freedom, not those who seek to aid persons to escape to freedom. The difference was too clearly pointed out by the colleague of the Senator [Mr. LANE] to justify me in taking further time in alluding to it.

But the Senator objects to this bill because it authorizes the calling in of the military; and he asserts that it is the only law in which the military is brought in to enforce it. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] follows this up with a half hour's speech, denouncing this law as obnoxious to the objection that it is a military law, that it is taking trial of persons for offenses out of the hands of the courts and placing them under the military—a monstrous proposition, he says. Is that so? What is the law? The first section provides, as I said, for securing equal civil rights to all persons. He has no objection to that. [Mr. WADE. Yes, he has.] No; I do not understand him to object to that. He thinks they are all entitled to equal civil rights.

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator says, as I understand him, that nobody has denied that. The second section of this bill provides for the punishment of those who do deny it. Has the Senator from Pennsylvania any objection to that?

Mr. COWAN. Not when it is done in the right way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not when it is done through the courts? All the rest of the bill provides for doing it through the courts, in no other way. It is a court bill; it is to be executed through the courts, and in no other way. But does the Senator mean to say it is a military bill because the military may be called in in aid of the execution of the law through the courts? Does the Senator from Pennsylvania—I should like his attention, and that of the Senator from Indiana, too—deny the authority to call in the military in aid of the execution of the law through the courts?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask him a question. The preventive power of the court is exercised by the writ of injunction. Now I want to know of the Senator what he means in this bill by conferring upon the military the authority to prevent a violation of this law. Is that in aid of a court, before there is any violation, and before a case can come before a court?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I mean, Mr. President, that the militia and the military may be called out whenever there is a combination of persons in any of the rebellious States so powerful that the marshals and civil officers in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings cannot execute the law. I mean that the military may be called upon at that time. I mean that whenever there shall be a combination there to protect a man who has violated this law, and the marshal is driven off, he may call a file of soldiers to go with him and seize the individual who sets at defiance the process of the court.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator does not in that combat any position that I assumed. I admitted that when the execution of process of the law was resisted by a combination of people, that insurrection, for the time being, might be put down by the military power of the Government. I said so. Now I repeat the question, what is meant in this bill by the preventive power of the military? Before a crime is committed, before a wrong is done under this bill, the President, or any person whom he may appoint, may call in the military power of the Government to prevent a crime. How is that in aid of the courts of the country?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; that is in aid of the execution of this law. Let me read a clause from the Constitution which seems to have been forgotten by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Pennsylvania, who has denounced this law, has been living under just such a law for thirty years, and it seems never found it out. What says the Constitution?

"Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union."

Then cannot the militia prevent persons from violating the law? They are authorized by the Constitution to be called out for the purpose of executing the law, and here we have a law that is to be carried into execution, and when you find persons combined together to prevent its execution, you cannot do anything with them! Suppose that the county authorities in Muscogee county, Georgia, combine together to deny civil rights to every colored man in that county. For the purpose of preventing it, before they have done any act, I say the militia may be called out to prevent them from committing an act. We are not required to wait until the act is committed before anything can be done. That was the doctrine that led to this rebellion, that we had no authority to do anything till the conflict of arms came. I believed then in 1860 that we had authority, and if it had been properly exercised; if the men who were threatening rebellion, who were in this Chamber, defying the authority of the Government, had been arrested for treason, of which, in my judgment, by setting on foot armed expeditions against the country, they were guilty; and if they had been tried and punished and executed for the crime, I doubt whether this great rebellion would ever have taken place.

Under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to provide for the calling forth of the militia to execute the laws of the Union, Congress at an early period of our history passed this act:

"That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress."

The militia, it will be seen, may be called forth to cause the laws to be duly executed; that is, to prevent persons from preventing their execution; and a subsequent statute of the United States authorizes the Army and the Navy to be used wherever the militia may be used. There is another statute, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and under which he has lived for thirty years without ever having known it; and his rights have been fully protected. I wish to call attention to a section from which the tenth section of the bill under consideration, at which the Senator from Indiana is so horrified, is copied, word for word, and letter for letter. The act of March 10, 1836, "supplementary to an act entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned,' approved 20th of April, 1818," contains the very section that is in this bill, word for word.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Read it. What is the subject-matter of the act?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is on the subject of revenue.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It relates to the collection of the revenue, I believe; and it contains this section:

"That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and to enforce the due execution of this act, and the act hereby amended."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was passed under a good Democratic Administration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, passed in 1838, and approved by Martin Van Buren.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A good precedent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It did not horrify the country; it did not destroy all the liberties of the people; it did not consolidate all the powers of the Constitution in the Federal Government; it did not overthrow all the courts, and it has existed now for nearly thirty years! What becomes of all this objection?

Mr. HOWARD. And it did not take the place of a writ of error.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, it did not take the place of a writ of error; the courts still exist. Now, is it not absurd, preposterous, and unjust to denounce this law as taking from the courts their jurisdiction? It does no such thing. It is in aid of the exercise of the powers of the courts; it is to clothe the courts with authority to carry into execution the writs they issue, the judgments they give. That is all there is of it. It is no new provision, no unheard-of thing. There is a precedent for it in the acts of Congress verbatim, and the authority is expressly given in the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, I cannot take time to reply in detail to every one of these objections as they are made. I am desirous to get a vote on this bill; we expected to get a vote to-day, before this hour; but I have felt compelled, when these questions are persistently urged upon the Senate and these perversions of the bill are attempted to be impressed upon the country, to correct some of them; and if I do not correct others it is not because I suppose they are not unfounded, but because at this hour of the day I think, with the corrections I have made, the country itself will make the corrections of the other misstatements or misapprehensions of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is not my purpose to continue the debate, but I think I may be pardoned for making a suggestion. When American liberty is to be subverted, when the whole character of our Federal existence is to be changed, when a republican form of government is to be changed into a consolidated despotism, I think we ought to have the opportunity to think a little when we come to pass an act that is to convert this free republican form of government into an absolute despotism; we ought to retire to our chambers and deliberate. Therefore, sir, without any desire, without any intention to mingle in this debate, I appeal to the honorable gentleman who has this bill in charge not to take the vote to-night. Let us retire to our chambers, and, after the words—the eloquent, warning words of the able and the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE,] who now is a link between the past and the present—let us go home, and if the fatal deed is to be done, let it be done to-morrow. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOWE.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, to strike out the tenth section of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Van Winkle—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Creswell, Grimes, Johnson, and Wright—4.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is due to myself and to the Senator from Illinois that I should say that the act from which he read was an act to prevent the organization and equipment of military expeditions upon our shores against foreign Powers with which we are at peace. It was a military law. My statement was that no precedent of a provision like that contained in the tenth section of this bill is to be found in any law regulating the civil rights of the people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to amend the bill in the second line of the first section by adding after the words "civil rights" the words "except the right to vote in the States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will only say in reference to that matter, that that is a political privilege, not a civil right. This bill relates to civil rights only, and I do not want to bring up the question of negro suffrage in the bill. I hope the Senator will not persist in any such amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to test that very fact. I may be mistaken, but for twenty years I have had to use the law as an instrument, as the workman uses his instruments, to make a living, and I do hold that under the words "civil rights" the power to vote is given, because it is a civil right. The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee who has this bill under charge says he does not mean to confer that right. His meaning cannot control the operation or the effect of this law, if the bill shall become a law. I believe that if this bill is enacted into a law your judges in most of the States will determine that under these words the power of voting is given. The honorable Senator cited an authority the other day, from Maryland I think it was, in which it was decided that that right was conferred after domicile had been acquired according to the laws of the State. Sir, I wish to exclude that very idea; and if you do not mean to confer that power I want you to say so. However highly I esteem the learning of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I am not willing to trust to his declaration that that power is not to be conferred, and I want this Congress to say that in conferring these civil rights they do not mean to confer the right to vote.

Talk to me, sir, about the words "civil rights" not including the right to vote! What is a civil right? It is a right that pertains to me as a citizen. And how do I get the right to vote? I get it by virtue of citizenship, and I get it by virtue of nothing else. When this act is passed into a law, and I find a Republican judge in any of the States of this country deciding that under it a negro has the right to vote, I am not going to quarrel with the opinion of that judge, because I believe he is deciding the law correctly. Sir, if you do not intend to confer that right, say so. If you do not mean to invade the States of this Union, and take from them the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters, say so. That is all I ask. Do not leave it in doubt.

As I said the other day, I know but two foundations of right that any man has: one is a right founded in nature; the other is a right founded in law. Under the law of nature I have got no right to vote. Under the law regulating society and government I have a right to vote. I get it simply on the ground of my citizenship; and your bill confers that right.

It will not do for the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee to say that by specifying in other lines of the first section the right to sue and be sued, and to give evidence, to lease and to hold property, he limits these rights. He does no such thing. He may think that that is the intention; but when you come to look at the powers conferred by this section, and when you consider the closing words of the section, giving to everybody, without distinction of race or color, the same rights to protection of property and person and liberty, when these rights are given to the negro as freely as to the white man, I say, as a lawyer, that you confer the right of suffrage, because, under our republican form and system of government, and according to the genius of our republican institutions, one of the strongest guarantees of personal rights, of the rights of person and property, is the right of the ballot.

Now, gentlemen, let us deal fairly, squarely, and honestly with each other. If you do not mean to confer this power, say so. I only ask you to say, by my amendment, that you do not mean by this bill to confer that power. If you vote down my proposition, what will be the interpretation put upon your law? If it shall go before any judicial tribunal of this country, and they find that you voted down this amendment, what is the interpretation they will put upon it? That you meant to confer the power, simply because you refused to say that you did not.

But, sir, I will not argue the question. It is a foregone conclusion that this bill is to pass, and I shall not detain the Senate. I want a distinct vote, however, upon my proposition, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Hendricks, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Stockton—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Creswell, Grimes, Johnson, and Wright—4.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORTON. I move to amend section seven by striking out all after the words "United States" in line twenty-five, as follows. The words to be stricken out are—

And in case of the escape of the person for whose arrest such warrant or process was issued, shall moreover forfeit and pay, by way of civil damages, to the party claiming to have been aggrieved by his act, the sum of $1,000, to be recovered by action of debt in any of the courts aforesaid within whose jurisdiction the said offense may have been committed.

This section seven provides that any person who shall obstruct or hinder or prevent an officer or other person charged with the execution of process issued under the provisions of the act from making an arrest, or shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, a person so arrested under a warrant, or the officer permits him to escape, he shall be guilty of an offense, and if convicted be subject to a fine. This part which I propose shall be stricken out predicates of that offense a civil liability to the person who made the complaint, or to any person who may feel aggrieved, and it being a public offense I suppose any member of the public may consider himself aggrieved. It seems to me that it is certainly improper to predicate of a crime or the commission of a public offense a civil liability to be responded to in a civil action of debt. I think for that reason so much of the section ought to be stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the bill is sufficiently efficient without this clause in it. I am not particular about it myself. It is, however, reported by the committee, and I do not feel at liberty to consent to the amendment; but I have no objection to its being adopted. I think the bill would be perfect without it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ANTHONY responded to his name.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. President—

Several SENATORS. Too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order, the call of the roll having commenced, and a response having been made.

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. JOHNSON's name was called.) The Senator from Maryland was necessarily called away some time ago, and he desired me to say that if present he would vote against the passage of the bill.

The call was concluded with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—33.

YAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Van Winkle—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Creswell, Doolittle, Grimes, Johnson, and Wright—5.

POST ROADS.

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 61) to establish certain post roads were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 16th of January, calling for the correspondence which may have taken place between himself and any of the judges of the Supreme Court touching the holding of the civil courts of the United States in the insurrectionary States for the trial of crimes against the United States; which was, on motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the 30th of January, a communication of General Sherman, relative to the condition of the States in his military department; which, on motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following message; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Believing that the commercial interests of our country would be promoted by a formal recognition of the independence of the Dominican republic, while such a recognition would be in entire conformity with the settled policy of the United States, I have, with that view, nominated to the Senate an officer of the same grade with the one now accredited to the republic of Hayti; and I recommend that an appropriation be made by Congress toward providing for his compensation.

—ANDREW JOHNSON.

FEBRUARY 2, 1866.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. FOOT. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next. The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 2, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Pacific Railroad inquire into and report, by bill or otherwise, on the expediency of extending an additional amount of Government aid to extend the Iowa branch of said railroad to the capital of Iowa until the amount shall equal that authorized in aid of the Kansas branch of the Union Pacific railroad.

HARBORS ON LAKE ERIE.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the repair and improvement of the harbors of Cleveland and Fairport, on Lake Erie; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SUITS AGAINST FEDERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. McKEE. I ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the indemnity act of the 3d of March, 1863, with an accompanying memorial of citizens of Kentucky.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask that the bill be reported.

The Clerk read the bill. It provides that in any civil or criminal prosecution commenced in any State against an officer, civil or military, for arrest during the existence of the rebellion, upon affidavit of the defendant showing that the arrest was made in good faith and in pursuance of orders of a superior officer, the action may be removed to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I object to its consideration.

Mr. McKEE. I will, then, bring it up on Monday morning when bills on leave are called for.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the payment of damages caused by the destruction of property of citizens of Iowa by certain Indians therein named; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. RAYMOND. I rise to a question of privilege. I made a motion yesterday, in the case of the contested election in New York city, to reconsider the vote by which certain papers were referred to the Committee of Elections. As I said then, I did it simply to allow the claimant to be heard before the House. Some objection was made on the part of several members that it might delay the matter too long. I wish to inquire now whether it will meet the convenience of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to have the matter discussed, or whether he prefers to have it put off until another day.

Mr. BROOKS. I have been before the Committee of Elections this morning for two hours, and have been addressing that committee, so that I feel physically unable to proceed with any discussion on the subject. It would suit me better to have it go over till Monday.

Besides, let me remark that to-day there occurs, by order of the House, at three o'clock, a vote on the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and if discussion arises on that subject now it will occupy the attention of the House up to that time; so that members from Kentucky and others who desire to speak will be quite unable to do so.

I wish the House to decide for itself. I do not wish to shrink from any discussion; though, as I say, I am physically unable this morning to do justice to any subject that comes up for discussion.

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to say, in consequence of what took place yesterday, and of the fact that there are several gentlemen on this side of the House who desire to debate this bill, and in view of the fact that a question of privilege has been raised by the gentleman from New York, I have agreed that the debate on the Freedmen's Bureau bill might continue through to-day and to-morrow, and that after the morning hour on Monday I would demand the previous question. And I wish to say, at the same time, that I desire that gentlemen who have the floor should debate that bill, and that I shall have to make a point of order if general debate is indulged in.

Mr. DAWES. In reference to this matter of privilege, as I stated yesterday, I do not intend to participate in the debate upon the immediate question before the House, which is whether certain papers shall be referred to the committee and be printed. But I have this to say, that I do think it is the duty of the House to decide to-day whether that mass of testimony shall be referred to the committee and be printed. I will, with the leave of the House, state the case, and state also why I think it is due to the committee that they should decide it to-day.

The case is this: in the contested case of Dodge vs. Brooks, the testimony, as the committee supposed, was submitted to the House at the commencement of the session and referred to the committee with authority to cause to be printed such portions of it as in their opinion it was proper to print, under a general order touching all the contested cases of elections. Upon an examination of the papers in this case, which were referred to the committee, it was found that it contained only the testimony upon one side of the case. The committee called upon the sitting member [Mr. Brooks] for his testimony, and they have frequently called for it from that day to this. Within a few days past there has appeared in the Clerk's office a large package of papers addressed, not to the Clerk of the House—

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] allow me?

Mr. DAWES. I am not arguing the merits of the case of the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. But the gentleman is in error in point of fact. I desire to say that upon the very first call or intimation made in the committee that it was my duty to transmit the testimony in the possession of the Clerk of the House to the committee, I caused that transmission to be made by my own movement in the House; and that prior to that time no notice was given to me by the committee of which I was informed.

Mr. DAWES. I have reason to suppose that long before the holidays the clerk of the committee distinctly informed the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] that there was no testimony in this case in behalf of the sitting member, and that if he had any to produce it must be produced immediately, in order that it might be printed with the other matter; that the other matter was to be sent to the printer upon a given day, and the committee was desirous of having his testimony submitted, that all the matters might go together to the printer and be printed in one book. After that the notice was repeated through the clerk of the Committee of Elections to the sitting member to produce his testimony, if there was any, that it might be printed with the testimony of the contestant, so that when the case might be ready for hearing there would be no cause or occasion for delay. This was before the holidays.

After the holidays notice was given to these parties that the case would be ready for hearing on a given day. That notice was extended from time to time. There never has been an intimation to the committee from any quarter that there was any testimony whatever to be printed until within a few days past. There then appeared, I understand, not in this House, but in the Clerk's office, a large mass of papers purporting, as the Clerk of the House is informed—I have not seen the inside of it—to be testimony for the sitting member. It was not directed to the Clerk of the House, or to the House, but as it stands now in the Clerk's office it is directed to the sitting member by name. Where it has been during the time since the taking of the testimony closed by law I do not know. By the statute the time for taking the testimony in this case closed nearly a year since.

The statute requires that the testimony shall be reduced to writing immediately upon its being taken, in the presence of the parties, by the judge taking the testimony, and by him sealed up and forthwith sent to the House of Representatives, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

It is under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, and after the case has been in hearing for two or three days before the committee, that in the absence of the committee from the House night before last, this package of papers in the Clerk's office was referred to the committee on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] and ordered to be printed.

Mr. UPSON. Before the recess.

Mr. DAWES. I am informed that the motion was made just before the recess, on day before yesterday.

I have no opinion to express on the question whether the testimony was properly taken or not, or whether properly sent to the House, directed to the sitting member or not, for I have not heard the sitting member on that point. I have this to say: that the committee took all the pains in their power to prevent just such a position of affairs as has occurred here to-day, namely, that they should go through five hundred and forty pages of printed matter on the part of the contestant, and then sit down one month after, when the testimony of the sitting member can be printed, and wade through all that.

The committee took all the pains they could to inform the sitting member that such would be the result, unless some pains were taken to have his testimony produced at the commencement of the session and sent to the printer with that of the contestant, and printed in the same book. It is the first case in my experience when the committee have been running round after parties asking for their testimony. They have not been very successful in this case, and I hope the House will now say whether the committee shall stop their work and rest on their oars while a book of some five, six, or seven hundred pages shall be printed for their benefit. That is all I have to say. I have no desire to influence the House on the question whether this testimony shall be referred or not, but I desire to have the question decided to-day, because if the House decides to have these papers printed, I hope the printer will work Sunday, if necessary, so that we may have this book printed by Monday morning.

Mr. RAYMOND. I had no object in calling up this motion except to enable the parties interested to be heard before the House, and that the House might come to a decision. I will now yield the floor to my colleague, [Mr. BROOKS.]

Mr. BROOKS. I do not want to take the floor by my colleague's courtesy. I claim it as a right.

Mr. RAYMOND. I surrender the floor unconditionally.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, nothing could so much surprise me, except the surprise I had yesterday from my colleague from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] as the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. If he, as a Representative of that State, desires to be rid of me at this early period of the session, he has taken a very summary step toward doing it by exerting the influence of that committee of which he is the organ to suppress the publication of all the testimony on my side, and if the House is to follow his lead, I may as well at this moment submit to what has been the fate of others, take up my hat and retire and go home to my constituency, leaving a large portion of the city of New York unrepresented as well as a large portion of our whole country.

Mr. DAWES. I failed to make myself understood if I made the gentleman understand that I am anxious to have him leave this House, or that I expressed an opinion one way or the other upon the merits of his case. I merely felt it my duty to state to the House these circumstances as a reason why they should pass upon this question.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the whole tone and tenor of the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, whether he intended it or not, are of a character to prejudice at least his side of the House against me as the sitting member, and to give the whole advantage of his position and his prejudice to the contestant.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts—and he is a man of honor, well entitled to the appellation of the honorable gentleman—will not rise in his place and say that he has officially given a notice, officially by sign and signature, of any necessity of my presenting these papers until officially he notified me to appear before him, when, upon the very day after, I made the motion in the House. The clerk of the Committee of Elections is connected with the public press, as most of the clerks of committees in this House are, and as a brother press-man I have had frequent conversations with him on this and on other subjects. But never, with my understanding, so help me God, was any official information given to me from the Committee of Elections that I was under an immediately order to present these papers to that committee, and on the very first intimation from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts I hurried to this House, and in no secret hour, at no evening session, but in the presence of the House, in its ordinary session, I asked that these papers be referred to the Committee of Elections, and printed.

And the first intimation that I ever had was from my honorable colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] connected with me in the public press—"Ettu, Bruke!"—that there was an intention on the part of somebody to suppress the publication of my testimony in this case.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, while the law in reference to testimony in cases of this kind requires that it shall, for some wise purpose—I suppose that it may be safely kept—be sent immediately to the Clerk, the gentleman justifies the withholding of this testimony from the House from last March till last week by the statement that he has not had any written notice under my hand.

Mr. BROOKS. Or official notice of any kind.

Mr. DAWES. Official notice, signed with my name as chairman of the Committee of Elections for the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I suppose the gentleman considers that necessary. I have only to say in answer to that—

Mr. BROOKS. There has been no notice, written or unwritten, scripta or non scripta.

Mr. DAWES. One thing at a time. I have only to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee of Elections directed its clerk more than once before the holidays to go to the sitting member in this case and tell him that, if he expected his testimony to be printed by order of the committee, it must be produced at once, so that it might go to the printer along with the other testimony and be printed in the same book. The clerk of the committee came back to the committee and reported that he had so notified the sitting member more than once.

Mr. STEVENS. Under seal?

Mr. DAWES. Not under seal—not under the broad seal.

Mr. STEVENS. That will not do, then!

Mr. DAWES. I do not know but that the law requires the notice to be in writing; but I did not understand that the gentleman, in response to the verbal notice of the clerk of the committee, made any objection at that time to the fact that it was not in writing. I have this to say: that the law imposed upon him the duty to send the testimony here nine months ago, not to keep it till this time. It was altogether a work of supererogation on the part of the committee to say a word to him about it. But the committee apprehended that just at the time when this case would be taken up we should experience just such a state of things as this; and in order to be ready, the committee requested him over and over again to bring forward these papers.

Now, I have a question or two to ask the gentleman: First, where have these papers been since last March?

Mr. BROOKS. For the last ten or fifteen days they have been in possession of the Clerk of the House, to whom I was directed to deliver them by the law of the United States. I have further to say that when he asks me with so much force where they have been since March last, he might with quite as much force ask the contestant where his papers have been since March last; for those papers did not turn up here till the first week in December, not even on the desk of the Clerk.

But, Mr. Speaker, I complain more of the spirit, the zeal, the energy, the enthusiasm of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, in a matter of this sort, and more of the spirit which my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] manifests here, than I do of the charges which the gentleman makes against me; and in the course of my remarks I will show how vague, futile, and unjust all those charges are.

Mr. DAWES. I will ask the gentleman—let him put his answer on the record—whether he has one word of complaint against me when sitting to hear any question of fact or point of law which he has ever presented touching his case?

Mr. BROOKS. Never, never. I will do the honorable gentleman the justice to say that I have the highest respect for him as a man and as a Representative here; and therefore I am the more surprised and amazed that he exhibits so much feeling and earnestness (so it seems to me) to suppress the publication of my testimony without hearing from me one word whatsoever.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the slightest objection to the printing of this testimony. I took some pains, and all that I have said to the House has been with the view of convincing the House that I did take some pains, to have that testimony before the committee early. My complaint is that the Committee of Elections have been trifled with in their effort to get this testimony, not that I desire to shut the gentleman's mouth or close the door against one particle of his testimony.

But I have a little desire to defend the Committee of Elections on this point, and no further. I have never, sir, forgotten to satisfy and urge the House to print the gentleman's testimony. I have come here, Mr. Speaker, to state that the gentleman has been guilty of laches; and that it has involved the Committee of Elections in great trouble and great expenditure of their time; that that committee are somewhat worn and fatigued, and that it is with some difficulty a quorum can be got together at the hour of appointment to continue these hearings. And are we to be carried down into the cholera season without one particle of excuse given for this delay in the face of the law?

That is all I have to say. And if the gentleman imagines I have taken sides with the contestant in this case, I pray him to remember I have quite as much to defend my course on this side of the House; and I must soon hope to be delivered from the position I am in, if I am to be fired into from both sides, and it is to be charged that I manifest inordinate zeal one way or the other in the hearing of these cases.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire to relieve myself from the complaints my colleague makes of having shown an improper and discourteous spirit toward him in regard to this matter.

I think I may fairly appeal to him, sir, to say it is not my habit in the press or out of the press to show discourtesy to any one with whom I may be connected. In this matter my fault, if fault it is, grows out of what has more than once got me into trouble, a desire to be over-courteous to both sides. I was not present when the motion was made by my colleague from New York, and was adopted, referring these papers to the Committee of Elections with an order to print them; and the next day I was appealed to by the contestant to make a motion for the reconsideration of that resolution, on the ground that it was passed without his being heard at all, and that he was desirous of being heard on that precise point. I declined for some little time, thinking some one more familiar with the case should make the motion; but finally, after his appeal to my courtesy, I made the motion. I disclaimed at the time to the sitting member any desire whatever to do him injustice, to prejudice his case, or put him to the slightest inconvenience; and when he complained in the House or out of the House, I forget which, yesterday, that this motion would have the result to postpone the consideration of this matter indefinitely, I told him, so far as I was concerned, I would do all I could to bring this motion to a speedy hearing. It was for that purpose I called the motion up this morning, the day after the motion was made. My first fault was in being over-courteous to the contestant, if fault it was; my second fault, if any, in being over-courteous to the sitting member.

I desire by these words simply to relieve myself from any thought or purpose of being discourteous to either. I simply want the matter fairly before the House.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I forbear entering into any discussion with my colleague on the matter of courtesy or discourtesy, as the gentleman is the best judge of that himself; but in reply to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who, I really believe at heart to be desirous to do justice, but who seems to have been irritated at me without any comprehension of the cause on my part, I desire to say he constantly uses language in this debate, in application to me, which shows some feeling for which I can but partially account. He says I have trifled with the Committee of Elections. It is not true. It is not true I ever have had any notice to supply or furnish my papers from that committee which I have considered official or unofficial. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts does not pretend to say that he has given me any formal written notice from the secretary of that committee.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts also wants the House to go on with this subject early, and he stated with much feeling that the reason why he wants to go on with it early was that the cholera season shall not arrive and members be compelled to adjourn. All this I say shows matter of feeling which I regret to see on the part of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the House to what the law requires of me as the sitting member. It will be found in Brightley's Digest, 255:

"The said magistrate (meaning the judge who is authorized by law to take evidence in case of a contested election) is hereby authorized and required to cause to be reduced to writing in his presence, and in the presence of the parties or their agents, if attending, and to be duly attested by the witnesses respectively: after which he [the said magistrate] shall immediately transmit by mail the said testimony, duly certified under his hand and sealed up, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the time being, together with a copy of the subpoena and of the notice served upon the party, as provided in the preceding section."

If any error whatsoever, it has been committed on the part of the magistrate who had the custody and possession of these papers, and who transmitted them to the clerk of the Committee of Elections, as required by law. I could not force Judge Brady, of New York, nor Judge Russell, nor Judge Barnard, who took this testimony, to submit it here at an earlier day, and if they failed in the execution of the law the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] ought to have asked for a process from this House to serve upon those judges to compel them to submit the testimony here. I have only to say that I have exerted all the power which I have physically, pecuniarily, and intellectually to produce the earliest transmission of this testimony to the Clerk of the House, as required by law. And no man has more deeply regretted or been more injured by the delay in the transmission of it than I have myself.

What has been the effect of this delay? Why, an ex parte account has gone all over the country of frauds committed in my district, which are not founded on one word of truth from beginning to end. Never was there a fairer election in any case in the world. I ran as no Republican candidate; I ran as no Democratic candidate. I ran without a single inspector of election, a single register, a single canvasser in my favor, while the whole body of canvassers, registers, and inspectors were appointed by the combined influence of Tammany Hall and of the Republican party to deprive me of my just rights and of my just vote before the people of New York. The very first, the opening part of the testimony, on the part of the contestant, discloses my position—that of Mr. Sherwood, page 80 of the document before the House.

"Question. Who was considered peculiarly the Democratic nominee?"

"Answer. Mr. Barr, I understood."

"Question. Had he what is more generally known as the regular nomination of the Democratic party?"

"Answer. He had, sir."

Well, sir, that is my position. Tammany Hall and the Republican organization, which creates three registers, three inspectors of election, and three canvassers, organized every one of those registers, canvassers, and inspectors in opposition to me; and I had not a single friend on the whole list. And if any frauds were perpetrated they were perpetrated by the Republican candidate, Mr. Dodge, and by the Tammany candidate, Mr. Barr. There were three of us running: Mr. Barr as the Tammany Democrat, Mr. Dodge as the Republican candidate, and I, on my own hook, smashed all the machines got up in that election.

Now, sir, how could fraud be committed? What object had I in having it done? Why should not I wish my testimony to go before the country at an early period, when I know and others know that ex parte statements have gone forth from official persons in this House—I will not say employed by the contestants, but garbled testimony from this ex parte record—to exhibit fraud on my part, when I had not a single officer of election whatsoever to commit a fraud?

No man regrets more than I do that the magistrate who had this testimony in charge did not submit it at an earlier period. And, Mr. Speaker, why was it not submitted at an earlier period? There are incidents in this election which will explain that as we approach it and examine it by and by, if the House ever chooses to take this testimony and examine it at all; if it is not shut out in this summary manner, which seems to be proposed by some parties in this House.

Sir, this has been a contest in the city of New York between the dollar, the almighty dollar, and numbers, almighty numbers. Never was there a harder contest between those powers. The contestant is a man whose income is $1,000 a day every day he lives. His recorded, registered income is over $1,000 every day that he lives; and when he went into the examination of this testimony, he was able to procure the ablest reporters, the best phonographic writers, without regard to money or expense whatsoever, while I, humble in my means, nothing but the publisher of a newspaper, a mere printer, and nothing but the printer of a newspaper, and restricted in my means, was compelled to employ reporters at a cheaper rate, not as good phonographic writers; and the consequence was that Mr. Dodge, with his means, was at an early period able to present these documents while it took a much longer time upon the part of the lawyer employed by me, and the judge who had the taking of the testimony, to prepare mine. The consequence was that not until after the holidays could a judicial record be made up that the judges would certify; and when they were satisfied with the record, as soon as possible, after the 1st of January, they made up the record of that testimony and transmitted it to the Clerk of the House.

GENERALS MEADE AND THOMAS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from New York to give way while I move that a recess of ten minutes be taken to allow the Speaker to present to this House the commander of the army of the Potomac and the commander of the army of the Cumberland, General George G. Meade and General George H. Thomas.

Mr. BROOKS. Nothing will give me greater pleasure, and let the record of the fact go out with my speech to the country.

Mr. GARFIELD's motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House took a recess for ten minutes.

[The SPEAKER, having conducted Generals Meade and Thomas to the Speaker's desk amid great applause, said:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, while time shall last and the Republic shall endure, none of us can ever fail to be grateful to the officers and soldiers who periled their lives for its preservation. True as the truest, and brave as the bravest, were Major General Meade, commander of the army of the Potomac, and Major General Thomas, commander of the army of the Cumberland, whom I have the pleasure, under your order, to introduce to you to-day. [Great applause.]

General Meade said: Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, impressed as I am with the solemnity of this occasion, introduced to you in so complimentary and distinguished a manner as I have been by the Speaker of your House, it is almost impossible for me to say in fitting terms how grateful I am myself, and how grateful is my friend and brother officer, General Thomas. If we may be permitted to construe the distinguished honor you have conferred upon us into a mark of your approval of our course during the great struggle which, by the blessing of God, has been so triumphantly and gloriously terminated, it will be to us ampler reward for all that we have done in our humble capacity. We shall ever bear it in grateful remembrance, and shall ever be most sincerely thankful. [Great applause, and loud calls for "Thomas."]

General Thomas said: Gentlemen, it was not my intention to have said anything, trusting to General Meade to express our feelings; but since you have called upon me to say a few words, all I will say is that I join with him in every word he has uttered, and most heartily and sincerely thank you for this compliment. [Applause.]

Mr. SPALDING called for three cheers for the two generals.

In response to this call the members of the House and the spectators in the galleries joined in a round of enthusiastic applause.

The two generals then came upon the floor, and the members of the House were introduced to them by the Speaker.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed business.]

PATUXENT RIVER, MARYLAND.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a report from the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, transmitting a statement of the advantages of the Patuxent river for the establishment of a navy-yard, in response to a resolution of the House of January, 17, 1866.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—AGAIN.

Mr. BROOKS. When I was so agreeably interrupted a short time since, I was explaining to the House that the month's delay in the matter of my testimony beyond that of the contestant—for the testimony of the contestant was not laid before this House until the first week in December, and mine was presented early in January—the sole cause of the delay on my part was because the phonographers that I was enabled to employ were not able with sufficient rapidity to furnish the testimony which the judges were willing to certify until a month later than the time the testimony of the contestant was presented. Therefore, my lapse was the lapse of but a single month, or a few days over.

And I may add here that the very moment the testimony came under my control, I hurried with it and put it in the possession of the Clerk of the House. I made that fact known to all who were interested.

Now, I put it to this House, if in a contest of this sort, because of mere clerical inability, and because of inability to employ at sufficient high rates phonographers who could do the work satisfactorily to the judges in order that they might certify to it, it is fair and just that my testimony should be refused publication, while the contestant by his greater power in those respects is to have all this advantage before the House and before the country. If so, then no greater act of injustice whatsoever could possibly be committed.

The whole expenses of my election were under $300, while the contestant in this case, in the taking of testimony, in the providing of judges to examine it, and in the reporting of that testimony, with the expense of summoning all the witnesses, has already cost me nearly $3,000. Hence when I say that this is a contest between money and numbers, I but charge a fact which is verified by the official testimony in this case which I hold here in my hands. The testimony in behalf of the contestant amounts to five hundred and forty-one printed pages, and I presume mine, when printed, will amount to nearly quite as much. The expense of taking this testimony was so great that if I had been aware of the contest to which I was to be subjected, the expense of it to one of my humble means, I would have entered the portals of this House upon the ex parte case, to be examined wholly with reference to any testimony upon the other side. I never would have incurred the expenditure of $3,000 for a seat in the House of Representatives.

The attorney in this case on behalf of the contestant was Mr. W. W. Phelps. This gentleman was examined before the judge, and his testimony is here recorded in this book on behalf of Mr. Dodge. I will read from his testimony:

"Question. What do you know as to the expense of the election to Mr. Dodge?"

"Answer. Of the gross amount of the expenditure to which he was put for election purposes I have no idea, except that it was very small considering the size of the district.

"Question. You have no idea what the amount was?"

"Answer. No, sir; except that I would be pretty sure that it was not $15,000, and was not $12,000—was not $10,000, I think; I do not think it was as much as $10,000.

"Question. Do you know of any particular sum as having been expended yourself?"

"Answer. Nothing, except an awful printer's bill.

"Question. What was the amount of the printer's bill?"

"Answer. Fifteen hundred and odd dollars.

"Question. Do you know any other item of expenditure?"

"Answer. None, except for hiring the Cooper Institute, which we did not use; we were going to have General Wool and others there, but we concluded not to do it; we had to pay $200 for that.

"Question. You know of no other item?"

"Answer. Not large amounts, except what I heard testified by Mr. Cowdin.

"Question. Did you ever have any communication with anybody in reference to this Barr matter?"

"Answer. Nothing, except that I was on the executive committee, and used to meet down there, and urged the importance of contributing liberally to Mr. Barr, who was a good sound Union man, because I would rather he would be elected than Mr. Brooks; I urged that strongly.

"Question. Was that before the payment to Mr. Barr?"

"Answer. Yes; I didn't know there had been any payment to him; I guess no one but Cannon and Cowdin knew it, unless I was supposed to know when they said we would take care of it.

"Question. In what assemblage was that said?"

"Answer. No assemblage; only when I saw Mr. Cannon in my office, he said we would make a great mistake if we didn't keep Barr on the track.

"Question. You didn't expect to be understood as having done that from motives of unimixed philanthropy?"

"Answer. No, sir; my object was to elect Mr. Dodge, if I could, as being the best Union man. My next object was to elect Mr. Barr in preference to Mr. Brooks. I thought Mr. Dodge would make the strongest run until three or four days before the election—until it was said that all the river districts were going Brooks, and that we were used up unless we could help Mr. Barr.

"Question. Do you know if Barr got any money from a Republican source?"

I ask the attention of gentlemen of the House to this part of the testimony, for they will learn from it something as to the manner in which elections are conducted in the city of New York. An ingenious candidate sometimes contrives to get both the Republican and the Democratic nomination; but as the Republicans will not always stand that, and the Democrats will not always stand it, a bargain is sometimes struck, and two candidates, one nominally representing each party, are nominated in order to effect the election of some other and favorite candidate. This was the process in this case:

"Question. Do you know if Barr got any money from a Republican source?"

"Answer. No, except the $2,000. That was not enough to make that had forty-five districts to take

"Question. Have you never heard of his receiving any money?"

"Answer. No, except when we saw it in such papers as the Leader, it was a joke to ask Mr. Dodge where the $25,000 was.

"Question. You do not know definitely of any other sum?"

"Answer. No; that was all. It was not an expensive election."

Ten thousand dollars was all that was spent—"We would have made it far more so if we had only known as much as we know now."

Hence, when I say that this was a contest with the "almighty dollar" from beginning to end, I think I establish it by such facts as these. The parties interested spent the amount of money that was necessary in running both the Republican and the Democratic machine, and they would have given a great deal more money to the Democratic machine if they had known that it was necessary. Now, I ask the attention of my Republican friends on the other side of the House to the consideration of this fact. In their estimation no election was of more importance than the contest between Mr. Lincoln and General McClellan. In their judgment the restoration of the Union, the interests of human liberty, the abolition of slavery, all depended upon the election of Mr. Lincoln. Yet in this case we find the contestant who is now before this House giving $2,000 to run the Democratic machine, to be used as well against Mr. Lincoln as against General McClellan, and that contestant now comes before this House and asks that the papers which I have obtained in this election shall not be published, and he expects a party majority of this House to do me the injustice of refusing to publish those papers. Mr. Speaker, I know that the Republican majority will never do it. God never made men who, under these circumstances, would be guilty of such an injustice.

No party bond, no party obligation, could induce the Republican majority in this House to commit so great an injustice against the sitting member. Not even the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] if he should insist upon it as a party question, would be able to bring about such a result. Hence I know that, if not one Democratic vote were given in this House, I could fearlessly throw myself upon the justice of the Republican majority, feeling assured that it would order the publication of my papers in this case, where the contestant has given $2,000 to Tammany Hall to run the Democratic machine.

But, sir, this is not all. This delay in the transmission of the testimony has been obtained with the consent of the attorney of Mr. Dodge, as well as by the action of the judges in the case. I send to the desk, to be read by the Clerk, a note from the attorney of Mr. Dodge, W. W. Phelps. His handwriting will not be denied by the contestant. The note is dated "Saturday, a. m.," and that "Saturday, a. m." was during the holidays, in the latter part of December or the beginning of January.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SATURDAY, A. M.
MY DEAR SIR: Have just received a telegram calling me out of town. Get key from janitor up-stairs, to take your testimony off my desk. I assent to any correction in the rest, not altering the sense, and authorize you to make it, and forward the testimony. I shall be back Monday, p. m.
Yours,
W. W. PHELPS.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. Moore, his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of a military reserve on St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes.

CONTENDED-ELECTION CASE—AGAIN.

Mr. BROOKS. So, Mr. Speaker, you see the lawyers were working amicably together in December last and early in January, in the preparation of testimony to be submitted to this House.

Mr. DAWES. I want a clear understanding of this matter. Am I to understand that in the latter part of last December and early in January the lawyers in this case were working over the testimony which the law required to be here last March?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir; there is the record. Mr. DAWES. Am I to understand that? I want to know.

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. That is all I want to know. Mr. BROOKS. If I knew what inference the gentleman derived from that knowledge I might have nothing more to say.

Mr. DAWES. I only want to say that when Congress passed the law of 1851 they thought they had contributed somewhat to the honesty of an investigation of this character by requiring that the testimony, as soon as it was taken, should be reduced to writing, and in the presence of the parties sealed up and sent to the Clerk, so there should be no occasion for temptation after the testimony had been taken on either side. I suppose that was the reason: I want the Committee of Elections to know they are to pass on a case made up in the city of New York during a few months past.

Mr. BROOKS. It was done by common consent of the parties. The testimony to be published, for I presume it will be by the consent of the Republican majority of this House, will show that both the parties have agreed to it. There is not one point or iota of dispute as to the testimony. Mr. Dodge's attorney has examined and assented to the testimony I have submitted; and my attorneys have examined and acquiesced and agreed to the testimony which Mr. Dodge has submitted. It was a matter of amity and consent between the attorneys; and there is the record which I read to this House. The insinuation of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that the parties have tampered with this testimony, I am surprised, or rather should be surprised, if I could have been surprised at anything which has taken place to-day in the discussion of this matter, to hear the gentleman make that remark.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want the gentleman to understand me to make an insinuation of that kind. I am simply desirous of understanding the whole facts. If the House refers to us such testimony, taken in that way, I will understand it to be instructions to us to take that testimony, notwithstanding the requirements of the statute.

Mr. BROOKS. I deeply regret the gentleman should not use with more care words in discussion, and especially such important discussion as this; and that he should seem to convey any such imputation against myself or anybody else of tampering with that testimony. Neither party raises such a question to any testimony the parties have submitted.

I beg the pardon of the House, Mr. Speaker, through you, for having so long entered into a preliminary examination of this case. I have felt it to be my duty, from the extraordinary course adopted to prevent the publication of my testimony through no fault of mine whatever. I know there is an immense Republican majority in this House. I know my destiny is with the honorable men on that side of the House. I know they will act as judges and not as partisans on this question. But whatever may be my destiny or fate here, I shall submit to it as a man of honor, guilty of no fraud and no injustice, and who has attempted to make an experiment before the American people, to see whether in a large Democratic district a member of Congress may be elected on the course he pursued in this House without any reference to the Democratic or the Republican party.

I have attempted to establish a precedent; and if the House puts their veto on that by allowing this contestant, in this side-way process, to put himself into this House, all will be reduced to party mechanism. Men, independent of party, will cease to have weight and influence in the country, and every man will become not only a tool of his party but a tool of mere party mechanism.

I desire to ask for information, what portion of the delay of causing the printing now of the testimony of the sitting member is to be ascribed to me? I understand one of the grounds on which objection is made here is that this House will be unable to reach that at the proper time when it ought to be reached. And then I trust we shall have some information as to what are the statutes controlling the taking of testimony and presenting it to the Clerk in this case, and how far that statute has been complied with.

Mr. CONKLING. The contesting member, as I understand it, desires to occupy the floor, and technically he is entitled to it. I suggest, therefore, that my colleague will get from him what he desires on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to ask a single question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks.] There seems to be an issue partly made up by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] which is not fully met by the gentleman from New York; and that is, that information was given in some sort of official way to the sitting member of the fact that the Committee of Elections required that his papers and testimony should be filed. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether the clerk of the committee, when he called on him, informed him that the Committee of Elections had passed a resolution requiring him to file these papers, and whether the sitting member was notified that it was by authority?

Mr. BROOKS. I never had any information, as I understood it, officially or unofficially, in any form from the clerk of the Committee of Elections, that that committee desired my papers. In conversation with him at various times and at various places, he asked me where my papers were. I explained to him in conversation the very same facts and the causes of the delay which I have submitted to the House here to-day, and how much I regretted it. And I think at one time I suggested to him, if not to others, that I should feel it my duty, if the papers did not soon come, to appeal to the House and ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to be sent in pursuit of them. But I never had an intimation, officially or unofficially, certainly no paper whatsoever, on that subject.

Mr. DAWES. It is due to the Committee of Elections that I should state that they understood, as a committee, that at least a dozen times the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] had been notified. They understood it as distinctly as possible, and at no time has it come to the knowledge of the committee that the gentleman was not entirely ready to proceed with his hearing until such hearing had been proceeded with two days, and the first intimation the committee ever had from the gentleman from New York, that I know of, that he was not entirely ready to begin and conclude the hearing, was when we took up the Globe yesterday and saw there that on the day before he had caused his papers to be referred to the committee. The committee did not know how it was. Just about a week ago we learned from the Clerk of the House that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] had deposited with him a package of papers directed to the sitting member, with instructions to keep them there until they were called for. That is all the committee knew. I am certain in the statement I now make in reference to the notice by the committee to the sitting member from the clerk.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question? I suppose I may ask it as I have been before the committee. I ask him if I have not made two points before the committee, namely: first, that the notice given me of a contest was not within the time required by law, and that until that point was decided I was not under the necessity of bringing my papers before the Committee of Elections, because if the committee decided in my favor there would never be any need of printing or publishing the papers; and second, that the contents of the notice were not given according to law? And I ask him if that argument is not now pending before the Committee of Elections, and if I have not contended, as

I still contend, that so far as my action is concerned, it was not necessary for me to seek for the publication of these papers until the Committee of Elections first decided that the notice was given within the thirty days required by law, and that the contents of the papers were according to law. The papers were in the Clerk's possession, and the moment either of these points was decided against me it was my duty to bring them before the committee, and not until then. That was the view I took of the case.

Mr. DAWES. If it is no breach of privilege for me to state what has transpired before the committee, I will simply state that the committee, after having done through their clerk what I have stated toward getting this case in readiness, notified the parties to appear at a given time and be heard, without any intimation from either party that they were not ready. The parties appeared before the committee without any intimation of the kind suggested by the gentleman from New York to the committee or in their hearing, and the committee proceeded in the ordinary way to the hearing of the case during one day. The next day the gentleman from New York desired to interrupt that argument and to take the two points which he has now suggested, and the committee permitted him to take the two points. Then for the first time the gentleman suggested that he proposed to hear this case as made up by the contestant first, and, if it became necessary for him, after that he proposed to have certain papers in the Clerk's office submitted to the House and referred to the committee. The committee replied to that that they understood the parties were to make up their record before they commenced their hearing, and that if he was ready to go to the hearing, upon the case as made up, let him say so; if not, to say so and show some reason why he was not.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the chairman of the Committee of Elections answer this question: if the committee had decided the first point in my favor, would it have been necessary to publish my papers at all?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly not; but I submit that it was not for the gentleman from New York to take that risk. It is the risk that every party in a court takes if he relies upon a simple point and prefers not to prepare his case otherwise.

Mr. BROOKS. But I did not rely on a single point. I relied on another point before the committee, and I want the gentleman to answer this question: if the notice was not in accordance with law, would it be necessary then to print my papers?

Mr. DAWES. Everybody understands that it would not be. Everybody understands that when a party is summoned into court he makes such preparation to meet the case as he thinks the case demands, and if he has confidence enough in any particular point not to deem it necessary to make up a record involving any other points, he goes to trial on that point.

Mr. HALE. The question which I ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections, for the information of the House, is this: what would be the probable extent of the delay to be caused by the printing of the evidence of the sitting member?

Mr. DAWES. I am unable to say, for I have never seen it. I have only heard from the sitting member that it is very much more voluminous than what we have already, which makes five hundred and forty-one pages.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to know from the gentleman from Massachusetts, for my own information and for that of the House, whether the law requires that the testimony in contested elections shall be presented to the House by any particular time.

Mr. DAWES. The law requires the parties on both sides to cause the evidence to be reduced to writing when it is taken, and the law limits the time of taking testimony to sixty days. It must be taken within that time. That time ended in April last year. The law requires the testimony to be reduced to writing by the officer taking it in the presence of the parties then and there, and within that time, and by him sealed up and directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and sent to the Clerk, and by him presented to the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand this to be merely a question about printing.

Mr. BROOKS. There is nothing about printing in the law.

Mr. DAWES. It is more than a question of printing as it is presented to the House. It is an instruction to the committee to receive and consider as taken conformably to law testimony which comes in under these circumstances, and they cannot help themselves.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Conkling] asks that the contestant, Mr. Dodge, be allowed to address the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BROOKS. I shall not object—although the gentleman has certainly no legal or constitutional right to appear in the case—if it is understood that I shall have an opportunity to reply to him.

Mr. CONKLING. Does my colleague say that the contestant has no right to be heard?

Mr. BROOKS. He has no such right under the rules and orders of the House at this period. He is not so much a member of the House and entitled to be heard here as are the members from Tennessee.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I beg to remind my colleague that his lack of right to be heard must be owing entirely to a technical omission in the resolution. I think I am right in saying that the usage of the House is uniform that contestants are allowed to be heard when their cases are under consideration.

Mr. BROOKS. But the case is not under consideration. There is no precedent for allowing a contestant to be heard at this stage. But do not understand me as objecting. I do not object, with the understanding that I shall have a right to reply.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has examined the resolution, and it does not give the right to the contestant to speak upon the case. But the uniform usage of the House has been that whenever a contested-election case is before the House, the majority of the House can give the contestant a right to be heard.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the contestant in this case, Mr. William E. Dodge, be allowed to address the House at this time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DODGE then took the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the sitting member in this case be allowed to reply to the contestant.

The SPEAKER. The contestant is now entitled to the floor. After he shall have concluded his remarks, the motion of the gentleman will be in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the contestant entitled to address the House without its unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He is; the Chair has just decided that he can do so by vote of the majority of this House. Before he proceeds with his remarks, the Chair will ask leave to lay before the House two messages from the President of the United States.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Believing that the commercial interests of our country would be promoted by a formal recognition of the independence of the Dominican republic, while such a recognition would be in entire conformity with the settled policy of the United States, I have with that view nominated to the Senate an officer of the same grade with the one now accredited to the republic of Hayti, and I recommend that an appropriation be made by Congress toward providing for his compensation.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1866.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPERIAL MEXICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th ultimo, requesting information in regard to the organization in the city of New York of the Imperial Mexican Express Company, under a grant from the so-called Emperor of Mexico, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State and the papers by which it was accompanied.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1866.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—AGAIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If it is in order, I would like to move that the sitting member in this case [Mr. Brooks] shall be allowed to reply to the remarks of the contestant.

The SPEAKER. The contestant is now entitled to the floor, and that motion is not now in order.

Mr. DODGE, (the contestant.) I am very much obliged to this House for the courtesy extended to me on this occasion, and I will not trespass upon its attention by any extended remarks.

The election in question was held on the 8th day of November, 1864. Immediately after that election there were very strong evidences that there had been irregularities and frauds in the eighth election district of New York more than sufficient to overcome the small plurality claimed by the sitting member. The whole vote of the district was about 22,000; and the sitting member claims a plurality of 148 votes. Reluctant as I was to enter into such a contest, yet I was urged to it from all parts of the country, and especially by those who had taken a deep interest in the canvass in my own district. And out of deference to them and to public sentiment generally, I felt it to be a duty to expose, as I thought I had an opportunity to expose, the machinery by which for years the wealth and influence of the mercantile portion of the city of New York had been deprived of a proper representation on the floor of Congress. The necessary legal notice was made and served upon the sitting member. On the 20th day of February we convened to take the testimony under my notice, and on the 8th of April the taking of the testimony on the part of the sitting member was closed.

The testimony taken on my part was taken in charge by Judge Brady, before whom it was taken. He took charge of all the papers, sealed them up according to law, and they were transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives during the fall, and were here in his possession before the opening of Congress. And on the second day of the session my friend from New York [Mr. Raymond] moved that the papers presented on my part be referred to the Committee of Elections, and be printed; and he likewise moved that the contestant have the privilege of the floor. I have sat here for two months, taking a deep interest in the debates that have been going on, but compelled to be a silent listener. I have been exceedingly anxious on personal grounds that this contest should be settled at as early a day as possible. I stated to the chairman of the committee that I believed that my papers were the first thing before the committee; that they had been presented before the papers of any other contestant, and that I hoped my case would be taken up immediately. The chairman said to me in reply that the committee had as yet only one side of the case before them; that the papers of the sitting member had not been presented. I immediately wrote to my counsel in New York, stating to him that, notwithstanding the promises that had been made to him by the counsel of the sitting member, that under no circumstances should the sending forward of that testimony be delayed beyond the opening of Congress, it was impossible for me to obtain a hearing before the committee, because the papers of the sitting member were not here. I constantly annoyed the chairman of the committee by asking him when my case would come up, and continually received the reply that the papers on the other side had not been received, and that he had more than once notified the sitting member through the Clerk of the House that the committee were ready to have the testimony on my side printed, and that if he had any testimony to print, it must be here.

Knowing that there was to be a prolonged adjournment for the holidays, I sent again to my attorney in New York and urged him to see the attorney of the sitting member and ascertain whether it was not possible to have the testimony sent here, that it might be printed, that the case might come before the committee, so that I might know whether I was to have the privilege of participating in the important discussions of this body or whether I was to return to my home and engage in my ordinary mercantile business. My attorney wrote to me, from day to day, that those papers would be here.

I knew where those papers were. I knew where they had been ever since the close of the investigation. I knew where they had been through the spring and the summer and the fall: that they had never been in the hands of the judge. They were in the hands of the attorney of the sitting member, who had assured my attorney that they should be ready in time. The attorney of the sitting member stated that for this purpose he had taken the papers with him into the country during the summer, that he might embrace the opportunity to examine and arrange them. When, late in the fall, he was again urged to produce those papers, he pleaded want of time, professional engagements, and the great difficulty of getting the papers in order. He said that he was very anxious to do so, and for that reason, as he had business out in the oil regions, to examine into the title of some lands there, he would take the testimony out with him, that he might take advantage of any leisure time to prepare it for transmission to the House.

I repeatedly urged my attorney to see whether it was not possible to get those papers here; for I took it for granted that I should get no hearing till they came. He called again and again on the attorney of the sitting member, and that attorney finally said to him, "Come here to the office and look over the matter with me here, and see whether it is all right." My attorney assented to that, and told him, "Fix it all up in your own way; only get off the papers as quickly as you can," and wrote him a note which has been read at the desk, the whole object being to get the papers here, if possible, that we might go on with the investigation.

I knew perfectly well that the sitting member, who has been so long a member of this House, and who ought to be familiar with the statute on this subject, was not conforming to that statute, but that he was delaying and delaying. Why he was doing so I could not understand, but it was perfectly plain that he was doing so. I was anxious that the papers should be sent here. I wanted them published in time. I wanted them published with the testimony on my own side, because the cross-examinations on the taking of his testimony are quite as valuable to me, in many instances, as the examination of my own witnesses.

At last, sir, we obtained a hearing before the committee. My counsel left his business in New York and came forward for five days before the committee. Mr. Brooks was there. He was there with his books. The chairman said they were ready to hear the argument. My attorney's argument occupied an hour or an hour and a half. Not a word was spoken by Mr. Brooks. Not an objection was made by Mr. Brooks; not a word about his papers. I took it for granted that he had made up his mind they were of little value, and that he would go into the contest on my papers, where he had such a lengthy cross-examination.

On the second day of the committee I was met there by an unexpected motion on the part of Mr. Brooks. The motion was to turn me out of the committee, and have the case, as the lawyers say, quashed, because I had no standing before the committee, having failed to comply with the statute by not giving him notice of thirty days. He argued that case before the committee. He argued during two sessions of the committee whether the thirty days should be from the report of the county canvassers or the report of the State canvassers. I have no information of the decision of the committee, but I have understood unofficially it was unanimously against him.

I thought he would be prepared now to go on with the examination, but he now raises another question for the decision of the committee, and that is want of sufficient and explicit notice to him as to the specifications and charges I have made. That he is now arguing, or in the process of arguing. Now, sir, although for more than eight months the sitting member had not in any way conformed to statutes so clear and so specific, which he of all other men ought to have known, and which I could hardly be expected to know, he being a member of Congress for so long and accustomed to the routine of this House—that he should not have known this, I say, was very strange. I was satisfied there was something—what it was I could not imagine—that there was something which satisfied him this would be of no consequence, for he would not have any necessity to use it; that there would be no necessity to present it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I never would have raised the question whether or not he had complied with the statute if his testimony had been here in time. If it had been here to have been printed I would never have objected to it; but he has had my book—which he has read here to-day—in his hands for weeks, while I have not had an opportunity to see his.

Now, at this late period of the session, when two months have already expired, and when questions of such large interest to the nation, and especially to the commerce of the city which I believe I was called on to represent—which I have not a doubt I am legally entitled to represent—when questions of such vast magnitude are coming before the House, I feel that I ought to have an opportunity to participate in its deliberations if I am to have an opportunity at all.

But, sir, I have been met on his part by a strict conformance to the statute, requiring from me the most strict adherence to the law, and now I feel it to be my duty to state to the House most clearly and positively that the gentleman has not in any way adhered to the statute. The statute was read by the chairman of the committee, and with your permission I will refer to it again. It declares that the testimony of the witnesses, together with the questions proposed by the parties or their agents, such magistrate is authorized and required to cause to be reduced to writing in his presence and in the presence of the parties or their agents, signed and duly attested by the witnesses respectively, which he shall immediately transmit by mail, duly certified under his hand and seal, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the time being. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may conclude that the sitting member has had in his hands or the hands of his counsel this testimony for the last eight months, then I say that I shall not have to prove that it has been in the hands of his counsel and not in the hands of the judge at all.

I aver that, although there may possibly be inside of the package a letter of Judge Russell saying "I herewith transmit," &c., Judge Russell has had nothing to do with these papers. They have been in the possession of Mr. Brooks or his counsel for more than eight months, and now he comes here and proposes to shut me out under the plea that I have not conformed to the statute.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have a right, after this long detention, to claim before this House that the gentleman, in order to have a standing before that committee, and to allow his papers to go there, must prove to the House that he has conformed to the statute. Now, I happen to have in my hand a copy of a receipt of Adams Express Company, transmitting the package from New York, which I will ask the Clerk to read. It will be seen that it is from Mr. Waterbury to Mr. Brooks. Mr. Waterbury is the gentleman's counsel.

The Clerk read the receipt, as follows:

NEW YORK, January 19, 1866.

Received, of N. J. Waterbury, one package; value not given; marked, Hon. JAMES BROOKS, Washington, D. C.

For the company:
Freight collected.

COLBY.

Mr. DODGE, (the contestant.) That package arrived here on the morning of the 20th of January. When the honorable gentleman received it I cannot say, but I know it was delivered on the 20th. The Clerk of the House, on the 24th, received the package from the honorable gentleman, with a request that he would take care of it until called for. Not knowing how valuable it might be, or what it might contain, he took good care of it, and I believe he now has it—a package, not addressed to him as Clerk of the House, but addressed to Hon. JAMES BROOKS. It was not enough that the gentleman should have had for eight months the testimony in his sole possession, but he must hold on to it even after it goes to Washington. He said nothing about its having to go to the committee. He did not go to the chairman and say, "I have been disappointed, and was not able to get this evidence before; but at last I have got it, and here it is." Not at all. What keeps it? Why, he never expected at all to have it printed or presented to the committee. He expected to send me home, because he would require from me the strictest performance of the requirements of the statute. He thought he had got me, but he found himself mistaken. And now he comes before this House, after having kept me here two months, and asks that his package shall be sent to the committee, with a request that the contents shall be printed, taking at least four or six weeks to print them, and sending me directly home in the midst of the argument, or requiring me to go through with mine and then taking his up when his testimony comes in.

I feel that it would be a very strange precedent for this House to set, and I cannot see how the Committee of Elections could ever get on in future, if a statute so plain, so specific, requiring that the evidence should be kept in the hands of the judge that takes it and by him held fast, sealed up, and sent to the Clerk of the House, is disregarded. I cannot see how this House can consent to such a precedent as to allow a member for eight long months to keep it in his own possession, then have it transmitted to him in Washington, then hold it there himself, and wait as long as possible to see whether his points are going to be held, and if they are not, then go before the House after all this detention and ask them to allow him to have his papers printed.

Sir, I was going to say I object, but I have no right to object, because I do not belong here. I was only going to suggest that I think I have a right to complain. Not that I would retort upon the gentleman; I have no such wish. Not that I am afraid of his testimony; I only wish it had been here in time to be printed. But I do not want, if I am entitled to a place on this floor, to sit here silently and have all these great financial and other important measures passed, I having no voice in the matter. Nor do I want to be kept from my business for two or three months longer, if I am not entitled to a seat here. I complain that the gentleman has met me in committee with a strict and determined adherence to everything within the statute, and then comes into this House, without having conformed to a single one of them, and asks that I may be longer detained, and that the House may go behind the statute and set a precedent here that may be injurious for all time to come, by saying that a member may keep his testimony, carry it with him in the country, take it to the oil regions, send it wherever he pleases, and then come in and ask that it may be printed.

And now, Mr. Speaker, having detained the House longer than I expected, I will say in answer to the gentleman's remarks, that they have nothing to do with this question of printing. He has talked about money, he has talked about party, he has talked about his being a candidate, not of the Democratic or Republican party, but of the people. Mr. Barr was the regular nominee of Tammany Hall; but Mr. Barr was known to be a loyal Democrat, what we in New York call a noble "war Democrat," who broke away from his associates and determined to stand by and sustain the country. Mr. Brooks's friends, not satisfied with that nomination, had him nominated at Mozart Hall by the Fernando Wood wing of the Democracy. There were a few, some four or five thousand, good war Democrats in the district who were willing to break away and support Mr. Barr, but the great mass of "the unterrified Democracy" of the district voted for Mr. Brooks. That is well known. They voted for him en masse. And why? Because they were mostly men who had skulked away and refused to come up and enlist; who had hid themselves away and refused to enlist until the bounties were raised so high that their cupidity overrode their political preferences; and then they came in. It was understood that Mr. Brooks was the representative of the party who had opposed the war, and that class of the Democracy went for Mr. Brooks.

The gentleman has referred to the cost of the election and the expenditure of money. He has spoken of $10,000 having been expended by myself. Has he read the cross-examination of my counsel? The question was asked by his counsel, "What did it cost Mr. Dodge to carry on the election? Did it cost him $15,000?" "No, I do not think it cost anything like that." "Did it cost him $12,000?" "No, I do not think it did." "Did it cost him $10,000?" "No, I do not think it did." The sitting member says the election did not cost him $300. It did not cost me $10,000, nor $7,000, nor $6,000. But I do not know that that has anything to do with the question whether these papers are to be printed or not.

The gentleman has spoken of the evidence here as being ex parte, and says that he would have to go before the committee upon ex parte testimony. Now, if gentlemen will look over the printed testimony on my behalf, they will find that where my counsel would ask a witness four or five direct questions, the cross-examination by Mr. Brooks's counsel occupies three, four, and five pages, thus occupying nearly all of my time; still, I was able to get in enough to show before the Committee of Elections, as I doubt not, the fact that I am entitled to a seat upon this floor.

Mr. BROOKS obtained the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to move that the gentleman from New York, the sitting member, be allowed an opportunity to reply to the contestant.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor, no other gentleman claiming it.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker. I return my thanks to the gentleman from Illinois for his kindness in endeavoring to give me an opportunity to address the House in reply to the contestant. I shall not ask the attention of the House for any length of time, because the contestant has given me very little to reply to. He commenced his remarks by saying that it was time that the wealth and influence of the people of New York should have representation upon the floor of this House. My honorable colleagues from New York, over the way, are hardly complimented by the remarks of the contestant, to say nothing of my honorable colleagues on this side of the House, when he complains that the wealth and influence of New York have not proper representation upon the floor of this House. My honorable colleague from New York, over the way, [Mr. RAYMOND,] represents a very respectable amount of money and property, and, as you have often seen on the floor of this House, is very well able to represent it; and my colleague over the way, in the rear of the contestant, [Mr. DARLING,] represents yet more money, more wealth, and more influence.

Mr. DODGE, (the contestant.) I was very careful to say "heretofore." I did not speak of the Representatives now upon the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. How long heretofore? When Mr. Cambreling and Julian Verplanck were here?

Mr. DODGE. That was many years ago, when I was a small boy.

Mr. BROOKS. And, my friend, you have only got to be a very large boy to make such charges. [Laughter.] Sir, the contestant only illustrates the spirit in which this contest has been managed throughout when he complains that my honorable colleague behind me, [Mr. CHANLER,] and my honorable colleagues heretofore, many of them men of eminent position and wealth and property, have not been proper Representatives of New York on the floor of this House.

And in order that there should be a proper Representative here it is very necessary that I should be thrown out of my seat, and that he may be thrown in.

The honorable gentleman mistakes the arena before which he is arguing this case. This is not the city of New York; it is the House of Representatives. This is not Wall street; not a stock board where stock speculation is going on all the while. It is a representative body of the industry, of the agriculture, of the labor, as well as of the property, of the country. And one hundred thousand laborers are represented here where there is one man of property represented. There are enough members on the floor of this House to represent the wealth of New York, even if I was not here at all. There are enough from other portions of the country to take good care of that interest. And when the contest arises one man of wealth and power will whip out all the Representatives of the lobby that may be about the Capitol. The more Representatives of labor, industry, and agriculture there are the better. Let us hear no more of that species of argument.

Mr. CONKLING. If I do not interrupt my colleague [Mr. Brooks] as he is replying for a purpose, I would like to call his attention to the particular question which strikes the minds of gentlemen in this part of the House, my own among others, as the real question here. If he has any objection I will not do it.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not the least objection.

Mr. CONKLING. The statute makes it obligatory upon contestant and sitting member alike to forward presently, I believe the word is "immediately," to the Clerk of the House the testimony which is taken; and by the Clerk of the House it is to be preserved, in theory of law, against all intermeddling and encroachment. Of course I do not mean to suggest now that there has been anything of that sort in this case. This is a matter of statute regulation. The gentleman will therefore appreciate, as part of the suggestion I make, that no notice is necessary by any committee to any one, in theory of law and in practice. In fact every man, be he sitting member or be he contestant, is as much bound to take notice of that statute as he is bound to take notice of any other law upon the statute-book.

Now, looking to this as a precedent, I ask the gentleman to explain, if he will, by what propriety the House can direct the Committee of Elections to do the very thing in this case which the statute says it shall not do, and to override the very consideration, for the sake of which alone the statute was enacted. How can this House properly establish for a precedent that the Committee of Elections shall disregard a statute which says, virtually, that no evidence shall be before it for this purpose except that evidence which was, according to the statute, transmitted to the Clerk of the House, and by him kept? How can the House properly say that the committee shall take into consideration in determining this case the very evidence excluded, and not only excluded, but branded by the statute as improper evidence, illegal evidence, incompetent evidence to be before the committee at all? Now, if the gentleman will relieve this case from the difficulty which presents itself in the view of establishing such a precedent as that, he will relieve me, and, I have no doubt, other gentlemen in regard to this question.

Mr. BROOKS. If there has been any neglect or violation of the law in this case by either party it has been done by both parties. It is not pretended that the testimony of the contestant was brought here until late in November or in December. The taking of the testimony was closed on both sides in April last; no testimony has been taken on either side since April last. And the testimony of the contestant in this case was not presented to this House until the first week in December, and it was not brought to the Clerk of the House until some time in November.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me—

Mr. BROOKS. I will proceed to answer the point of his inquiry.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me right here to say that the argument of the gentleman does not touch the point I make, because the evidence on the other side not being here, we are not acting upon it. When it comes up no doubt we will consider that question.

Now, regardless of what has been done on the other side, and pointing the inquiry to this evidence, I would like an answer.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman must let me answer in my own way. My mind is not legally constructed as the gentleman's mind is, and therefore I must approach the inquiry in the way that best suits my ability.

The Constitution of the United States gives this House the right to take testimony at any time. It can go on now, and take all the testimony in the case anew. This House can order the whole testimony to be taken over again.

Now, sir, as the gentleman chooses to confine me to the law, I desire to call the attention of the House to the statute, for I have literally and strictly complied with it. If anybody is in fault in this case it is the judge, or the judges, against whom the wrath of the House should be directed. The statute provides—

"The testimony of the witnesses, together with the questions proposed by the parties or their agents, the said magistrate"

Not the sitting member—

"is hereby authorized and required to cause to be reduced to writing in his presence"

Not to send to the Committee of Elections to be printed—

"and the presence of the parties or their agents, if attending, and to be duly attested by the witnesses respectively, and certified by the judges."

All of which has been done; there is no dispute whatever about that fact. If these formalities have not all been correctly observed the Committee of Elections will attend to that, and will take care to throw out the testimony.

"After which he"

Not the sitting member or his attorney, but the magistrate—

"shall immediately transmit by mail the said testimony, duly certified under his hand and seal, up to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the time being."

Now the contestant in this case says that this package was transmitted to the Clerk of the House on the 24th of January, and he arrives at that fact by a certificate from the Adams Express. Well, I will admit that the Adams Express has brought on this season two things for me—first a pair of boots, and second, the testimony in regard to this contested election; but whether this certificate relates to the boots or the testimony is not stated in the certificate. I will, however, admit the fact to be as the contestant has assumed. I was not here when that testimony came to the hotel where I am boarding; but on the very day on which it came into my possession, I brought it to the Clerk of this House and deposited it with him, as the law requires me to do, subject to the order of the Committee of Elections. In that way, I discharged my whole duty.

I never have seen an iota of that testimony since last April; and I have no more idea than the contestant, not half so much, perhaps, in reference to the contents of that testimony. He and his attorneys have looked over it again and again; but I have left the matter to my attorneys and do not know what there is in it, except so far as I heard it in March last.

The gentleman seeks to hold me to a strict accountability to the law, because, as he says, I seek to hold him to such an accountability. Who began this matter of insisting on a strict accountability to law? The gentleman ingeniously contrived to issue his notice to commence taking testimony in this contested election on the 20th of last February. I was then here as a member of this House. A most important session was then drawing to its close. The measures then pending, among them the internal revenue bill and the tariff bill, of great interest to the people of New York, so largely taxed, required my presence here. But the contestant so arranged his case that his testimony could not be taken until the 20th of February, so that I had presented to me the alternative of neglecting the important interests which I represented here, or going to the city of New York to attend to my contested election.

I chose to attend to my duty here, and to attend to my constituents with regard to this contested election; and in order to obtain the sanction for or against it of the Committee of Elections and of its chairman, I addressed a letter to him at that time, and that letter is appended to these documents, asking that chairman to state to me, in order to lay before the judge and Mr. Dodge himself, what was the practice in this case when a man was member of Congress, and what ought to be the action of Mr. Dodge and the House. I ask the Clerk to read this letter to show who it is who first took these sharp points.

The Clerk read, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 22, 1865.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your note of this date inquiring whether it would be agreed by parties to a contested-election case to extend the time for taking testimony beyond the sixty days provided by law, so that the testimony could be received and recognized as properly taken by Congress. What is the practice here in that regard? There have been since I have been upon the committee repeated instances of the extension of the time by agreement, and no question ever raised as to the validity or propriety of the proceeding. Several in the present Congress: one where answer and all proceedings after notice were postponed by agreement till after the adjournment, two years ago, Rice vs. Sleeper—a closely contested case. This was done at the request and for the convenience of Mr. Rice engaged here. You also inquire about the case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell in this regard. Mr. Campbell was at the time of taking the testimony in that case chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and begged for an extension of time by agreement, because he could not leave his duties here. It was refused by Mr. Vallandigham. Mr. Campbell's political friends here thought it very hard treatment, and he asked the House for that reason to grant him a further time to take testimony. Mr. Campbell's friends all voted to give the further time, and Mr. Vallandigham's friends all voted against it. It was made a subject of just complaint by Mr. Campbell's friends. It was then the freely expressed opinion of those friends of Mr. Campbell, that as neither party could suffer by mutual agreement for postponement, it was not quite right to compel Mr. Campbell to leave his duties here to take depositions.

I do not desire, of course, to interfere with any one's ideas of his right or duty in what I have said, but only to answer your inquiries.

I am truly yours,

H. L. DAWES.

Hon. JAMES BROOKS.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed without amendment House bill No. 143, for the relief of Charles F. Anderson; and that it had also passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 36) for quieting doubts in relation to the validity of certain locations of land in the State of Missouri by virtue of certificates issued under act of Congress of February 17, 1815;

An act (S. No. 71) to authorize the Postmaster General to deposit postage stamps and stamped envelopes for sale; and Joint resolution (S. No. 27) for the exhibition of specimens of gold and silver and other minerals, the product of the United States.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—AGAIN.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, it is not only proved by that letter of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, but by the printed testimony, which I will read:

"Mr. Waterbury then asked for an adjournment of the proceedings for ten or twelve days, which was objected to by Mr. Phelps. Mr. Waterbury then, on behalf of Mr. Brooks, offered to consent in writing to extend the time beyond the sixty days provided by act of Congress for commencing and closing the proceedings, if an adjournment should be granted for the time required by Mr. Brooks. The counsel for Mr. Dodge declined to assent to the proposed extension of time and adjournment, and the proceedings were thereupon adjourned until the 23d day of February, 1865, at 7 o'clock p. m. At the time to which the proceedings had been adjourned, as just mentioned, the parties again appeared, when Mr. Waterbury renewed his application for an adjournment, and in support of it read extracts from the published proceedings in the Winter Davis contested-election case, and also a letter from the Hon. H. L. Dawes, (which letter or a copy thereof will also be found in the appendix,) insisting that the consent, if given, to extend the time beyond the sixty days would not prejudice the rights of Mr. Dodge. Mr. Phelps, on behalf of Mr. Dodge, declined to consent to the adjournment."

I never had proper time to take testimony. The whole ten days were lost to me. I had to work through counsel who knew nothing of the case.

Here we find that sharp practice on the part of the contestant from the beginning, and he has no right to complain now that I met him with early objections before the Committee of Elections.

Now, I think I have complied with my whole duty as required by the law. I have never been obliged to ask for the printing of these papers. I did ask the House for it, and the House consented, and now the attempt is made to take it back by reconsideration. It is not necessarily indispensable that these proceedings should be in print, but it is for the convenience of the committee. It is, however, a matter of strong justice that they should be printed. It is in the power—and I ask the attention of the Republican part of the House to this declaration—it is in the power of the Printing Bureau in this city to bring back all of that testimony by Wednesday next and have it properly printed. If it is necessary—I know the powers of that printing office—it could bring it back on Monday morning next. I do not care how quickly it is brought back.

Mr. DODGE, (the contestant.) I wish to make a suggestion. I said in my remarks that I should never have raised the question at all in this House in regard to the breach of the statute on the part of the gentleman if it had not been for the manner in which I have been delayed for two or three days in committee. I am willing now, so far as I am concerned, out of courtesy to the gentleman—but I forget, he does not want my courtesy—I am willing to withdraw any objections I have made before the House, if it is the desire of the committee, in order that these papers may be printed as rapidly as possible, and that the committee may at once proceed with the examination of this matter.

Mr. BROOKS. You might work the committee to death.

Mr. DODGE, (the contestant.) I do not want them worked to death.

Mr. BROOKS. I can work all day and all night, and endure as much as any man.

Mr. DODGE, (the contestant.) I would remark to the gentleman, before the committee has taken up any time in reference to wealth and other outside things, I would like to get at this matter, if that is understood, and go right into the investigation of the question at issue.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman will soon learn that neither he nor I can control the proceedings of this House. If he should have the good fortune to be brought on the floor of this House to-morrow he will soon find that nothing will be done here until next June or July except to debate certain measures. It is not in the power of either of us to hurry the committee, cholera or no cholera. All of us know that we have got to sit here till July or August. Hence, not only the House, but the gentlemen on the committees, will enjoy themselves socially, as well as politically, spite of any hurrying we can inflict upon them. No influence can induce them to hurry; neither his nor mine; and when he has been here a little longer he will find out that this is not New York city, but a very different sort of a place; and that whenever this body undertakes to hasten it hastens very slowly.

So far as I am concerned, I am willing to act. But there are other cases pressing here. My friend on the left, [Mr. HARRIS,] this disloyal gentleman, is to be turned out of the House; and he ought to be, if he is a rebel. He is anxious for a hearing before the Committee of Elections, and he cannot get it.

Mr. RAYMOND. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. RAYMOND. I have already explained the motive which induced me to make the motion to reconsider the vote already taken, and that was simply to have some explanation of the causes of delay. I understand the contestant now to say that he was entirely willing that this matter shall be dropped if the sitting member will assure him that he intends to go forward promptly and readily with the investigation of this matter.

Mr. BROOKS. I will go as fast as possible. What a pity it is that we have wasted the time of this country from a quarter past twelve to a quarter to three in debate upon this matter!

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not think this time has been wasted. We have arrived at some knowledge of the facts of the case, with which we had not the slightest acquaintance before. I think the time so far has been well spent, and if the two contestants are now agreed that time enough has been spent in the matter, I am quite willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BROOKS. I have something more to say, but I have nothing further now if that is the understanding. All I want is to have the papers printed.

The motion to reconsider was accordingly withdrawn.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports of a private nature, beginning with the Committee of Elections.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which these papers have been referred, and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is too late; it must be made on the same day or the day succeeding.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there is no use in my motion at all.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE PRESIDENT'S HOUSE.

Mr. SPALDING, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back a bill to authorize the President to appoint certain officers of his household, and fixing their salaries, and asked that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to be made the special order for Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. There are three or four special orders which antedate it.

Mr. SPALDING. I will run the risk.

The order was accordingly made.

Mr. ELIOT. I make objection to any more special orders being made before the consideration of the Freedmen's Bureau. I now move that the order of the morning hour be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask, then, that it be dispensed with, and that the House resume the consideration of the Freedmen's Bureau. The gentleman on the other side [Mr. KERR] has the floor, and I am desirous to have the debate continue and close.

Mr. HALE. I object.

QUARANTINE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. RAYMOND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the erection of warehouses in the port of New York, for the reception of merchandise arriving in vessels subject to quarantine by the laws of the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RAYMOND also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretaries of War and the Navy to place hulks and vessels at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine in New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I now demand the regular order of business.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand to enable me to introduce a proposition to prevent the cholera coming to this city.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I cannot withdraw it for any purpose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, he will be the first man to take it. [Laughter.]

REV. JOHN C. JACOB.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the House No. 113, for the benefit of Rev. John C. Jacobi; and the same was laid upon the table.

SARAH WITT.

On motion of Mr. WARD, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of bill of the House No. 133, for the relief of Sarah Witt; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOHN WHISTLER.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of John Whistler, and others, for compensation for destruction of property; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL OFFICERS, AND OTHERS.

Mr. WARD also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of naval officers, masters of merchant vessels, marine insurance companies, and others, asking for compensation; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ADDIE THOMPSON.

Mr. SLOAN, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Addie Thompson, of Norwich, New York, asking for relief; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NANCY M. WILSON.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Mrs. Nancy M. Wilson, late of the State of Missouri, asking compensation for property destroyed by the Union Army and by guerrillas during the late war; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MURPHY V. JONES.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Murphy V. Jones; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL V. B. STRIDER.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the House No. 110, for the relief of Samuel V. B. Strider, and the same was laid upon the table.

J. DUDGING.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of J. Dudding, for relief; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK SHERIDAN.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Frederick Sheridan, praying compensation for injuries received in the Government service; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PATRICK M'NAMARA.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Patrick McNamara; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

C. J. FIELD AND C. F. CLAY.

Mr. SLOAN. I am also instructed by the Committee of Claims to make an adverse report on the claim of C. J. Field and C. F. Clay. I will state that this case comes within the resolution adopted by the House the other day on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PHINEAS T. FRAZEE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the claim of Phineas T. Frazee; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING TO-MORROW.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand it has been arranged to have to-morrow devoted to debate upon the Freedmen's Bureau bill. A great many members wish to know if any other business is to be done to-morrow excepting debate.

Mr. ELIOT. I suppose that by a general understanding of the House the whole of to-morrow will be occupied in debating that bill, without taking any vote on it or doing any other business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask whether it is intended to exclude the introduction by unanimous consent of resolutions or bills for reference merely.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think we better have it understood that no business at all will be done to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Unless some objection be made, it will be entered as the order of the House that no business be done to-morrow, but that the session shall be devoted exclusively to debate upon the Freedmen's Bureau bill as the special order.

No objection was made.

COMMODORE JOHN A. WINSLOW.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to report back the memorial of Commodore John A. Winslow, for relief for property destroyed or appropriated by the Government during the rebellion, and I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

Mr. BANKS. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] if there has been any hearing before the committee in that case. The reason I make the inquiry is that Commodore Winslow has informed me that some information upon this subject has been forwarded which I am sure the committee has not yet received. It is well known that Commodore Winslow commanded the frigate which destroyed the rebel pirate Alabama, and he should have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The House has passed a resolution which covers this case, in the opinion of the committee, and therefore there is but one course to be pursued.

Mr. BANKS. If that is so I have nothing more to say.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, was then agreed to.

ROBERT MORRIS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report upon the petition of Robert Morris; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM JOHN HARDING.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon a bill (H. R. No. 137) for the relief of William John Harding; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID ELLIOTT AND GEORGE H. A. KUNST.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, also, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the petition of David Elliott and George H. A. Kunst; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HARRISON RINGGOLD.

Mr. WARD, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the petition of Harrison Ringgold for compensation for property destroyed; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Appropriations, a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, for the year ending June 30, 1867; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Monday, the 12th instant, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of; and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS FOSTER.

Mr. STEVENS also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the petition of John Foster, chief messenger in the Third Auditor's office, Treasury Department, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES H. TORREY.

Mr. NIBLACK, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Charles H. Torrey; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

R. L. B. CLARKE.

Mr. NIBLACK also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of R. L. B. Clarke; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

ABELARD GUTHRIE.

Mr. NIBLACK also, from the same committee, reported back a bill for the relief of Abelard Guthrie; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY HAYES.

Mr. THORNTON, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the memorial of Henry Hayes; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HARRISON GILL.

Mr. THORNTON, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the petition of Harrison Gill.

Mr. McKEE. I understood in committee that this case was not to be reported upon until we had had some further action upon it.

Mr. THORNTON. I know there was some conversation in committee, but my understanding was that, upon the memorial and vouchers as presented, the committee had agreed to report adversely upon this claim.

Mr. McKEE. My understanding was that the report was not to be made for the present.

Mr. THORNTON. Very well; then I will withdraw it.

The report was accordingly withdrawn.

COLONEL R. E. BRYANT.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the benefit of Colonel R. E.

Bryant, late commissary of subsistence, &c.; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the bill be read at length.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department to allow Colonel R. E. Bryant, late commissary of subsistence, on a settlement of his accounts, a credit of $1,484 13, the vouchers and accounts for which were lost or destroyed, falling into the hands of the enemy at Holly Springs, Mississippi, on the 20th of September, 1862, if on examining the evidence the Commissary General shall deem him justly entitled to the credit; but the same is not to be allowed without the Commissary General shall certify his approval thereof.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the reading of the report, and it was read.

It states that Colonel Bryant kept all his accounts correctly and had proper vouchers for them; but that one voucher for $1,088 63 was lost in the course of transmission to the proper Department; that another voucher for $395 50 was destroyed, together with Colonel Bryant's books and papers, at the capture of Holly Springs, Mississippi, on the 20th of December, 1862; that by reason of this destruction of his books and papers Colonel Bryant could not make reports covering the deficits.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the bill provides that this credit shall not be allowed except upon examination by the Commissary General, I shall not object to the passage of the bill, as I should otherwise do.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say, in connection with this bill, that there are many other cases of the same class, and it occurs to me that there should be some general law to cover such cases. There is a law, February 7, 1863, which provides for the settlement of all claims of this kind where the rank of the officer is not higher than a captain. This case is excluded from the operation of that law.

I have no objection whatever to the passage of this bill; but I take this opportunity to suggest to the committee the propriety of preparing a general bill embracing all cases of this kind, so as to dispense with the necessity of legislating here upon each separate case. The settlement of these claims, like claims for commissary stores captured, should properly be intrusted to either the Commissary General or the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I differ with my friend from Pennsylvania as to the propriety of passing any general law to cover cases of this sort. If there are any individual cases which are meritorious, we have abundant time to pass upon them. I doubt whether a general law could be so framed as to embrace only cases really meritorious.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I take issue with the gentleman from Illinois. I think that bills of this character do not generally receive in this House that degree of consideration to which often their merits entitle them. Cases of this sort are much more likely to receive proper examination at the hands of some appropriate executive officer, whose sworn duty it shall be to examine them carefully. In this way, too, the interests of the Treasury would be more effectually guarded than they frequently are in instances where special legislation is obtained to meet particular cases. I do not mean to intimate that the committee do not give these cases all the investigation in their power; but they have not the time which an executive officer of the Government, charged with the examination of such matters, would have. I am in favor of a general law, under which some responsible officer or officers of the Government shall be charged with the examination of cases of this description. I think that these losses should not be thrown upon the Government without the most careful consideration.

Mr. McKEE. With due deference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think we need no general law on this subject. A general law, instead of relieving us from embarrassment, would only tend to create confusion. This is one of a class of cases which no general law can possibly reach, but which must be acted upon individually, according to their respective merits. The bill, in this case, provides that, before credit shall be given, satisfactory evidence must be presented to the Commissary General, so that the interests of the Treasury are properly guarded. The bill does not make any appropriation of money.

I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. CAMPBELL.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the benefit of John W. Campbell; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow John W. Campbell, late quartermaster of the seventh Kentucky cavalry, on the settlement of his accounts, $4,770, money expended for the use of said regiment, the vouchers and accounts having been lost or destroyed by falling into the hands of the enemy at Cynthiana, July 17 and August 23, and Richmond, Kentucky, August 30, 1862, respectively, if on examining the evidence the Quartermaster General shall deem him entitled to such credit.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I will say in regard to that bill that it is exactly of the nature of the one just passed. The evidence is stronger, if possible, that this officer has done his whole duty, and that the papers and vouchers were lost by falling into the hands of the enemy. There is in the petition a full statement of every dollar and every cent which passed into his hands. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. INGE HAMPTON.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the petition of J. Inge Hampton, of Iowa; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

POST ROAD BILL.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 61, to establish certain post roads.

There was no objection, and the amendments were taken up.

The SPEAKER stated that he had examined the amendments of the Senate, and that they contained nothing but for the establishment of post roads.

Mr. ALLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the reading of the amendments will be dispensed with, as they are merely for the establishment of post roads asked for by members of Congress.

The amendments of Mr. ALLEY were agreed to; and the amendments of the Senate, as amended, were concurred in.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made the following adverse reports; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed:

The memorial of Robert A. Hill for the relief of certain persons residing in the State of Mississippi:

The petition of Philip Frazer, district judge of the district of Florida, for increase of salary; and

The petition of A. G. Miller, for reimbursement of expenses incurred in an effort to impeach him in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

HEIRS OF SHABONA.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of C. W. Marsh and others, for an annuity or some other relief for the heirs of Shabbona; which was laid on the table.

BARNEY CAIN.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely on Senate bill No. 58, being an act for the relief of Barney Cain; which was laid on the table.

WIDOWS, ETC., OF DECEASED PRISONERS.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the memorial of Lydia J. Stull, praying that widows and orphans, &c., of prisoners that died at Andersonville and other rebel prisons be allowed the same commutation for rations as may be allowed to the surviving soldiers and officers discharged from said prisons; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES FRIGATE.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of James Frigate, for an increase of his pension, or for a back pension; which was laid on the table.

GLOVER BROUGHTON AND OTHERS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Glover Broughton and twenty-two others, residents of the town of Marlborough, Massachusetts, who served on board of a privateer in the war of 1812, praying for relief; which was laid on the table.

DATE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of citizens of New Hampshire, praying that the pension law be so amended as to allow to soldiers pensions from the date of their discharge; which was laid on the table.

CORDELIA MURRAY.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, asked leave to report the following bill, and to have it considered at the present time: an act for the relief of Cordelia Murray, widow of George W. Murray. It provides for the payment to Cordelia Murray of the pension granted to George W. Murray by an act of Congress approved December 20, 1864.

The bill was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the motion by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT HENNE.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, asked leave to report a bill for the relief of Robert Henne, and to have it considered at the present time. The bill provides for an increase of pension to Robert Henne, late of company I, twelfth Missouri infantry, from seventeen to twenty-five dollars per month.

It was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not disposed to make any opposition to the bill, but I suggest at this time that there is need of general legislation to provide for classes of this character, which are not now provided for. I took occasion some time ago, when the question of the appropriation of money for the payment of pensions was before the House, to state that there was a class of pensioners who were not provided for sufficiently in the general law. We go so far as to say that a man who is disabled from earning his own livelihood by labor shall have full pay. There is another class of persons not provided for. You limit pensions to that class who have lost two arms and two eyes. Men may be disabled otherwise so as to be unable to help themselves. I know a case in which a soldier was shot through the body in the spring of 1862. He is confined to his bed and is dependent on the charity of his neighbors for his support. The neighbors come in and wait on him night and day. Now, that class ought to be provided for by some general law, and I submit that the Committee on Invalid Pensions ought to bring in a bill of that character. Because it is not every person that is so situated that he can get the ear of a member of Congress, or get persons to draw up a petition and make his case known, so that Congress, by special legislation, can reach his case. I have no objection to this bill, but I repeat that we ought to have a general law.

Mr. PRICE. I want to say to the House, in reference to this case, that I am personally acquainted with the applicant, and if there are any cases in the country in which additional pensions are required, this is certainly one of those cases. This man, with but one arm at the commencement of this rebellion, insisted persistently until he got himself into the service of his country. He followed the flag not only with his own regiment from Iowa, but when he could no longer retain a place there, he went into Missouri and joined a regiment there, and defended the flag until, in addition to the loss of an arm, he lost the use of the other arm, and was under the necessity of having a leg amputated. Such men, who rallied to the defense of their country under such circumstances, in the hour of her darkest peril, ought to be remembered by the friends of the nation when peace has once more dawned on the country.

Mr. PERHAM. Perhaps I ought to say, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that the Committee on Invalid Pensions have now under consideration various propositions for the amendment of the pension laws, among which is the one to which he has referred, and it will be considered and reported on in due time.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I am in favor of a general law on this subject, but I have no disposition to interfere with the passage of this bill. It does seem to me that the House will do itself great credit and the country great service by passing a general measure such as is suggested; but I do not desire to delay the passage of this bill, of which I am in favor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLARISSA BENSON AND ELLEN HUGHES.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the memorial of Clarissa Benson and Ellen Hughes; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM G. INGRAHAM.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of William G. Ingraham, of Westfield, New York, asking for an increase of pension; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN ALFORD.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of John Alford, asking an increase of pension; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES YOULY.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Yould; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay out of any fund which may have been appropriated for the payment of pensions, to Charles Yould, of Dunkirk, Chataque county, New York, late private in company D, seventy-second regiment New York volunteers, the sum of \$135 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ cents, being at the rate of five dollars per month from the 25th day of November, 1862, to the 27th day of February, 1865.

The report was read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amount of money involved in this case is very small, but it seems to me that this bill establishes a very vicious principle. It changes the general law in regard to pensions, by allowing a party to come in and prove that he sent his papers, but that they did not reach the Pension Office. The rule is that a party can only receive his pension from the time that his papers are filed. This bill takes claimants out of that rule, and leaves it open to parties to prove in every case the time at which the papers were put in the post office. I am not unwilling to give this party \$135 33 $\frac{1}{3}$, the sum named in the bill, but I do object to the establishment of this principle, as it will lead to great abuse.

Mr. TAYLOR. The gentleman is right in part but not in whole. The present pension law gives a pension from the date of the discharge if the application is made within one year thereafter. This man Yould forwarded his application within that time. And it is proved by evidence satisfactory to the committee that through no negligence of his the application failed to reach the Pension Office in time. As soon as he learned that that was the case he renewed his application, but that was after the expiration of a year from the time of his discharge. It was the fault of the mail, or of the clerk of the Pension Office, who should have acknowledged the receipt of it as provided by law. The man has used all diligence in his power, and the committee do not consider that it was any fault of his. And therefore we propose to allow him the small amount of five dollars a month from the time of his discharge to the filing of his application.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill, upon which the House divided; and there were—ayes seventy, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVY PENSIONS.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Invalid Pensions House bill No. 82, allowing persons having lost one foot and one hand in the naval service of the United States the same pensions now allowed to persons having suffered the same loss in the military service, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, upon which I am directed by the committee to ask action at this time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the substitute be read.

The substitute was read. It provides that persons in the naval service of the United States, who have lost one foot and one hand in the line of their duty, shall be allowed the same pensions as is allowed by law to persons in the military service who have suffered similar losses; and also that the provisions of section five of the pension law of July 4, 1864, shall apply to persons in the naval service.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. The term "military" in the former law was construed not to include persons in the naval service of the United States. The design of this substitute is to equalize the pension law.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The Committee on Naval Affairs have had referred to them a Senate bill which I think covers the same ground as this, and which they will report whenever an opportunity presents itself. If it is in order, I will report that bill from that committee at this time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] to say that the Senate bill is precisely like the one reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It is not precisely the same, but it is intended to effect the same object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] that he accept the Senate bill as a substitute for his.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I will hear the bill read first.

The Senate bill (No. 24) to amend section five of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 4, 1864," was then read.

It provides that the section referred to shall be amended so as to allow persons in the military or naval service of the United States, who have lost both feet in the line of their duty, a pension of twenty dollars per month; and those who, under like conditions, have lost both hands or both eyes, a pension of twenty-five dollars per month.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That Senate bill does not cover the entire ground covered by the bill reported by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDING.] There is another law discriminating between those who have lost limbs in the military service, which does not apply to persons in the naval service. It is a law passed subsequently to the act of July 4, 1864, and provides for those who have lost one foot and one hand in the military service. The bill reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions refers to that class of cases, extending pensions to the naval service.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Then I prefer the other.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour is just about to expire. If this discussion continues the bill will go over.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon agreeing to the substitute reported by the committee.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the business now in order is the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, on which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a moment, that I may report and have passed a bill for the relief of an aged lady.

Mr. KERR. I cheerfully yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

CATHARINE MOCK.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill for the relief of Catharine Mock; which was read a first and second time.

It provides for the payment of a pension of eight dollars per month to Catharine Mock, of Baltimore, widow of William H. Mock.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] to yield to me for a moment that I may report a resolution from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KERR. I yield to the gentleman.

REPORT OF REVENUE COMMISSION.

Mr. LAFLIN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That twenty thousand extra copies of the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying report of the commission appointed to make a revision of the revenue laws, pursuant to the act of March 3, 1865, be printed for the use of the members of this House, without covers, excluding forms of bills.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] to yield to me for a moment, that I may make a report.

Mr. KERR. I yield to the gentleman.

MESSENGERS FOR HOUSE POST OFFICE.

Mr. ROLLINS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee of Accounts the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster of the House of Representatives be allowed two additional messengers for the term of two months, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of seventy-five dollars per month.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. GUTHRIE AND R. L. B. CLARKE.

Mr. DAWES. With the consent of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] I move to reconsider the vote by which the House, a few moments ago, referred to the Committee of Elections the petition of R. L. B. Clarke. I also move to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of Abelard Guthrie was referred to the same committee. I desire that both motions shall be entered. I think that the House, in referring those two matters to that committee, must have acted under a misapprehension.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, on which Mr. KERR was entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Indiana proceeds, the Chair desires to make a statement. By order of the House, to-morrow will be devoted exclusively to speeches upon this bill, no vote to be taken. The Speaker will be compelled to be absent to-morrow, the last day on which he purposes to be absent during the session. He has requested the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] to act as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, it is surely safe to assume that our country has known no hour, since the organization and establishment of our matchless form of Government, when its circumstances demanded in its Representatives a higher order of statesmanship, or a more unselfish devotion to those great principles of our system which stand like beacon-lights against dangerous boundaries, inviting the embarrassed mariner to safer paths. Desiring to keep these lights in view, and confessing with sincere earnestness my lack of both ability and experience, I beg leave to submit a few reflections upon some of the solemn questions that demand appropriate action at our hands. And I shall endeavor to do this in a spirit unshaded by the impulses of partisan feelings.

The true relations of the several States to the Union have always presented problems of great interest and considerable difficulty for determination by one or another of the departments of the Government. But now for the first time we are compelled to confront questions resulting from the temporary suspension of the constitutional relations between the United States and some of the States. This suspension was the result of a state of war between the legitimate Government and the States that attempted to secede therefrom. It is conceded by most men, and is declared by the highest judicial tribunal in the Union, that during that state of war the respective parties to it sustained to each other the relations of belligerents. At the threshold, therefore, it becomes material to inquire what is meant by a state of belligerency. In its primary signification, it means a state of war. It implies an issue, asserted on the one side and denied on the other, and submitted for decision to the solemn arbitrament of arms. The recognition of the existence of war, the tacit or express admission of belligerent rights by the legitimate Government, concedes nothing inconsistent with its claim of sovereignty over the revolted people and territory. It does not even concede the existence of a Government de facto. But if it did, it would not at all impair the force of my argument, because the very term de facto implies a spurious Government, without rightful existence, as contradistinguished from a Government de jure, of right, or having rightful existence.

It simply admits the verity of existing facts; and thereupon certain well-established principles of international law and the laws of war become operative between the contestants, to limit their rights and powers pending the strife, and regulate the manner of conducting the bloody arbitration. It involves no admission of separate nationality or independence to the revolted States. On the contrary, it is the most solemn denial of all such claims. Nationality or independence is the very issue to be tried, and for the rightful Government to admit it would be worse than absurd, and suicidal. These belligerent rights are recognized of necessity in the interest of civilization and humanity. War without them would be such a mode of mutual destruction and carnage as has not disgraced any civilized nation for many centuries. War is that abnormal, convulsive condition of society, the culmination of human passions, which snatches the scepter from the hand of civil power, and substitutes for a time the laws of force for those of reason and choice. But, in the wise providence of God, the desire of self-preservation ultimately subordinates to itself the impulse for mutual destruction, and war becomes a temporary condition; and all its usages, rules, and laws, are likewise temporary. By Governments, maintained for the aggrandizement of the rulers, war may be prosecuted to destroy, and conquest and indiscriminate confiscation or appropriation of property may be the results. But in Governments based upon the will of the people, and administered in the interest of republican liberty, war is prosecuted by the legitimate Government, not to destroy nor for conquest, but to protect and preserve; not to deny, but to maintain and support the right of self-government; not to consolidate or centralize power, but to maintain and enforce the law; not to take the lives of States, but to preserve them, "with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired." These principles have always been avowed and never repudiated by the organs of our Government during the late war. They are also approved and promulgated by the most respectable writers on such subjects.

The only righteous end of any war is just and honorable peace, and, in such a Government as ours, if war become necessary to suppress insurrection or rebellion, its ultimate purpose cannot be enlarged beyond that of a national war. It is limited to the vindication of the rightful authority of the Government. Its office is done when obedience to the law is secured, for such obedience is the highest aim of war; such obedience is peace.

It indicates a confusion of ideas to speak of a number of people or a State in rebellion, as an independent belligerent. It is an inversion of the order of cause and effect. Independence is the result for the attainment of which the rebels have assumed an attitude of belligerency. But belligerency is not independence, and is never allowed to determine the civil relations of States. The only code established by belligerency is that which regulates the conduct of war. It ceases to have any field of jurisdiction as soon as war ends and peace begins. When the temple of war is closed, the code of war is sealed and laid aside to await the renewal of human strife.

The learned annotator of our greatest textbook on international law, Mr. Lawrence, says:

"The recognition of belligerent rights in a colony or portion of a State in revolt from or opposition to the metropolis is not to be confounded with the acknowledgment of the absolute independence of such province or colony."—Wheaton, International Law, p. 40.

Judge Sprague, of Massachusetts, one of our most upright and learned Federal prize judges, in his opinion in the case of the Amy Warwick, illustrates the same idea in the following clear and forcible language:

"It has been supposed that if the Government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms. This is an error, a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent rights cannot be exercised where there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute and unlimited sovereign rights. But no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile power, either from without or within a nation, takes possession and holds absolute dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation, by force of arms, expels or overthrows the enemy and suppresses hostilities, it acquires no new title, but merely regains the possession of which it had been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights."—Law Reporter, June, 1862, p. 498.

President Woolsey, of Yale college, in his work on international law, published in 1864, at page 231, uses the following just expressions:

"The same rules of war are required in such a war [civil war] as in any other; the same ways of fighting, the same treatment of prisoners, of combatants, of non-combatants, and of private property by the army where it passes; so also natural justice demands the same veracity and faithfulness which are binding in the intercourse of all moral beings. Nations thus treating rebels by no means concede thereby that they form a State, or that they are de facto such. There is a difference between belligerents and belligerent States which has been too much overlooked."

Every just conclusion or inference of law arising out of the opinion of Justice Grier, in the prize cases in 2 Black's Reports, is in exact harmony with these authorities. The court in these cases merely recognizes the fact that a state of war exists, and has been declared to exist by the executive department of the Government, and thence rightfully deduces the right of the Government to resort to a blockade as a means of warfare, and to make prizes of vessels that attempt, after due notice, to disregard that blockade. The judge says:

"The laws of war, as established among nations, have their foundation in reason, and all tend to mitigate the cruelties and miseries produced by the course of war. Hence the parties to a civil war usually concede to each other belligerent rights. They exchange prisoners, and adopt the other courtesies and rules common to public or national wars." * * *

"By the Constitution, Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. It cannot declare war against a State, or any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution. The Constitution confers on the President the whole executive power. He is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

"It is not necessary that the independence of the revolted province or State be acknowledged in order to constitute it a party belligerent in a war according to the law of nations."—2 Black's Reports, pp. 668, 669.

He also says that in organizing the rebellion the seceding States acted as States, claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their superior allegiance to the Federal Government, and that their right to do so was then being decided by wager of battle. But that wager has been decided against them, and the right is therefore denied.

Judge Grier says that Congress has no constitutional right to declare war against any State or States of the Union. Unless the United States is a confederation of States, as contradistinguished from a general government formed by the people of all the States, and unless each State in the confederation is an independent nation, then his position is logical and undeniable. No Government can declare war against its own subjects. Its whole duty is to enforce submission and obedience to law and to its rightful supremacy. The duty of the Executive is to see that the laws be faithfully executed, and of Congress to give him every needed and rightful facility for the accomplishment of that end; and if in the prosecution thereof a state of war ensue, and belligerency be recognized as resulting therefrom, then the Executive and Congress are certainly at liberty to resort to all the means rendered necessary or expedient and lawful by those conditions. But the moment the resistance to the law is overcome, and its supremacy is recognized and obedience restored on the part of the rebels, the former relations between the United States and the States which had attempted to secede survive and become operative again. In the language of Judge Sprague:

"The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights," and any other theory would be "a grave and dangerous error." "Under our Government the right of sovereignty over any portion of a State is given and limited by the Constitution, and will be the same after the war as it was before it."

But the relations of the people lately in arms, in rebellion against the Government, would be quite another thing. The punishments of violated duty and outraged law would continue suspended over them individually which must be suffered in their bodies or estates, or both, unless they are relieved therefrom by the clemency of the Executive or the Government. These questions, however, I do not propose now to discuss.

If the country accepts the theory of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and others on this floor and elsewhere of like opinions with him, that the people and States of the South actually succeeded by their rebellion in effecting in legal contemplation such a complete severance of their former constitutional relations to the Federal Government as that, upon the suppression of their wicked rebellion those relations do not survive and become operative again, then it should also accept the logical and lawful results of that theory, the "radical consequences" so much deprecated by Judge Sprague. What are those results? They may be briefly stated to be:

1. That the war was not prosecuted for the restoration of the Union, or to the end that the seceding States might survive the conflict as members of the Union, but in fact was prosecuted for the conquest of independent States, notwithstanding the almost daily repeated declarations of our Government to the contrary, addressed to the people of the whole country, both North and South, and to foreign nations, and made in the most solemn forms of executive messages and proclamations, laws of Congress, and military proclamations and orders, from the commencement of the war to this present hour, including the proclamation of the Secretary of State announcing the abolition of slavery by constitutional amendment adopted by three fourths of all the States.

2. That those constitutional relations having been completely severed, secession then became an accomplished fact, and the so-called confederate States an independent nation, and their citizens aliens and foreigners, not rebels and traitors liable to be punished under the municipal law for their crimes, and the Federal Government did not suppress the rebellion but conquered the confederate States, and now holds them as conquered territory, subject to the absolute control and disposition of the United States, uncontrolled by any laws or constitutions.

3. That secession having become an accomplished fact, the confederate States became a nation, and therefore possessed the right and power inherent in every nation to contract debts which are valid and binding upon its people, and as the conquest of one nation by another does not cancel the debts of the conquered nation, the public debts of the confederate States, and of the several States in the confederacy became the debts of the United States, and so far as they are held by the citizens of foreign nations, they cannot be repudiated by the United States without dishonor and giving cause of war. Mr. Wheaton says that, in case of conquest of one nation by another:

"As to public debts, whether due to or from the revolutionized State, a mere change in the form of Government or in the person of the ruler does not affect their obligation. The debts being contracted in the name of the State, by its authorized agents, for its public use, the nation continues liable for them, notwithstanding the change in its internal constitution. The new Government succeeds to the fiscal rights and is bound to fulfill the fiscal obligations of the former government. It becomes entitled to the public domain and other property of the State, and is bound to pay its debts previously contracted."—Wheaton's International Law, p. 52.

The country cannot accept theories bearing such fruits as these; it will prefer to hold fast to the better doctrines of the late President on this subject, and of every department and officer of the Government heretofore, and of Congress as declared in its numerous resolutions declaratory of the purposes of the war, and of every officer and soldier in the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the present Executive—all based upon the principle that the seceding States were never, in fact or law, out of the Union, but only engaged in a treasonable and sanguinary but unsuccessful effort to get out. The rebels said, in their madness, that they had in fact severed their relations and obligations to the Federal Government, but the latter never admitted such a result, but claimed, on the contrary, that they had in truth only succeeded in taking their Representatives out of Congress and making a bloody war in a cruel and wicked attempt to establish their independence of the Union. Congress during the war never ceased to treat them as States in the Union. It enacted laws which by their terms embraced all the States in rebellion. It apportioned Representatives to all the States by their respective names on the basis of the census of 1860. It levied direct taxes upon all the States by name, whether in rebellion or not. All its general laws are designed to operate alike in all the States. Its system of internal revenue applies alike to all the States; and it has never been admitted or holden that the failure to use the prescribed stamps in the rebellious States was not attended with the same legal results there as in the loyal States. In all our intercourse with foreign nations the rebellious States have been claimed to be in the Union, subject to its laws, and, when they would abandon resistance thereto and return to their obedience, entitled to its benefits and to resume all their civil and political relations with it. These relations were only suspended for the time being by the existing state of war. The pretended government called the "confederate States" had no legal existence; it was a myth, a dream, never vitalized, never realized. It was not that government that we were fighting, but the actual, living, and material obstacles in the shape of armies and all the enginery of war, which were interposed by the people of the rebel States between us and the enforcement of the laws.

This doctrine was never supposed to lead to the absurd conclusion that all the rebel armies were mere bands of organized murderers, until it became the design of some in the country to prevent the restoration of the Union, to the end that they might the better gratify a thirst for vengeance and impose conditions inadmissible under any correct theory of the contest, and secure certain partisan advantages in the country. When resistance to the rightful authority of government becomes the joint act of great numbers of persons, and assumes the forms and instruments of war, and can only be overcome by the use of the like forms and instruments, it should be treated as war, and, by the common consent of civilized nations and of approved writers on the laws of nations and of war, it is so treated. Let one citation on this point suffice. Vattel says:

"Whenever, therefore, a numerous body of men think they have a right to resist the sovereign, and feel themselves in a condition to appeal to the sword, the war ought to be carried on by the contending parties in the same manner as by two different nations."

He admits, however, that—

"A prince, of a cruel and arbitrary disposition, will immediately pronounce that the laws of war were not made for rebels, for whom no punishment can be too severe."

But he invokes an appeal to more sober reason, and says we should—

"Recollect that all of the sovereign's rights are derived from those of the State or of civil society, from the trust reposed in him, from the obligation he lies under of watching over the welfare of the nation, of procuring her greatest happiness, of maintaining order, justice, and peace within her boundaries."—Vattel, pp. 426, 421.

The teachings of public law are therefore in harmony with the true interpretation and the requirements of our Constitution. The obligations and duties of the Federal and State Governments in all their relations to each other are reciprocal, and the neglect of them by the one does not relieve the other from its duty to observe them. Indeed, throughout the whole contest no other motive principle was ever appealed to or avowed on our part but the desire to meet and discharge these obligations and duties. The views of Judge Sprague and of Vattel, although written under widely different circumstances and in different ages, could not well have been made more applicable to the condition of our country.

The force of these principles cannot be impaired by any fanciful definitions of the word State, either in its general or constitutional sense. Some attempts of that kind, with which this House has been entertained, have exhibited more cunning than candor. It is assumed by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] that a State "is a multitude of people united together by a common interest and common laws, to which they submit with one accord." This definition is quoted from Burlamaqui, and was written by him in reference to nations generally, and is now made to define a State in this Union. What does this definition require? Does it require that every citizen of each State shall submit "with one accord" to the laws of that State, and that his disobedience shall cause the destruction of the State? If so, how long could any State on earth exist? If the perpetuity of States is thus at the mercy of every citizen, it would require a political millennium to preserve it. Does it mean that the disobedience of the Federal laws by any citizens of a State, or even by the Legislature of a State, works the destruction of such State, or severs its relations to the Union? If so, our Federal Government is indeed a rope of sand. It lacks the first element of the power of self-preservation—the right to treat every act of its citizens, or of its component States, designed to sever their obligations to it, as void and of no effect—and its existence is maintained by a feeble thread. If this definition is to be accepted as a canon of constitutional construction, then it must be conceded that many of the now "loyal" States have often been out of their proper relations and appropriate orbits, and that the Union has been several times dissolved, because many citizens in those States have always been habitually disobedient of certain laws of the United States, and many State Legislatures have enacted laws that have been judicially held to be unconstitutional and void, and have by State legislation practically nullified within their States a solemn requirement of the Constitution. But, strange as it may appear, those States were never supposed on that account to have ceased to be States in active vital relations with the Union, or to have "abdicated" or "forfeited" their State existence, or dissolved the Union. They were never taken charge of by Congress for the purpose of teaching them obedience, or to secure guarantees against disobedience. But such citizens were treated as individual offenders, and such enactments were held to be void, although they were practically operative in those States.

Then it is claimed by the same honorable gentleman that in order to constitute a State of our Union, first, "its citizens must owe, acknowledge, and render supreme and habitual allegiance and obedience to the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States in all Federal matters;" and second, "all the members of the State Legislatures, and its executive and judicial officers, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States;" and third, it must have been admitted into the Union; and fourth, have thus become entitled as a State to participate in the control of the Federal Government. Now, as a statement of the duties of citizens and States toward the Union, this is excellent doctrine, and I endorse it; but as a definition of a State I am unable to perceive its propriety, although most emphatically assured by the honorable gentleman that "no one who can read the Constitution will deny that each State in this Union must have every one of these properties before it can commence to exist in the Union, because the Constitution so declares." I have searched in vain for such a declaration in the Constitution. Nor can I find any provisions in that glorious bond of government which, taken separately or together, justify any such conclusions or afford any rational or logical ground for such an assumption. It would poorly commend the wisdom of its framers if it were there. It would require many things to be done by the State and its citizens as conditions precedent to its existence which can only be done after its creation as a State. The State must exist before its citizens can owe allegiance or render obedience to the Federal Government as citizens of the State. The State must exist before it can have a Legislature, or judges, or a Governor who can swear fidelity to the Constitution. Then the Constitution says:

"The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

There is nothing in this provision about conditions precedent. When new States are admitted into this Union the only requirement as conditions precedent are that the people of a prescribed territory shall make and adopt a constitution republican in form; and when these things have been done and duly certified to the President, he by proclamation announces the creation of a State. Then, and not before, its duties and obligations as a State in the Union and those of its citizens attach. It is thenceforth a member and its citizens are subjects of an indestructible Union.

The acts of such State in its corporate capacity, which are in violation of the Federal Constitution, are simply void. Suppose its Legislature and its judges and Governor should refuse or fail to take the constitutional oath of office, or should take the oath and then violate it by the enactment of an unconstitutional law, or by a like decision of its courts, or by a like act of its Governor, which have too often been done in both sections of the Union. Would these things take the State out of vital relations with the Union? Would they work a dissolution of the Union? Or make dead States? Surely not. The Government would merely vindicate its authority by its appropriate officers and tribunals. The principle and legal results would be the same whether the rightful authority of the Government were thus resisted by officers or citizens of the State; by one hundred, one thousand, or one hundred thousand. If the resistance could not be overcome by the ordinary agencies of civil power, then the Government would be equally bound to use other appropriate means to vindicate and reestablish its authority. But such vindication can result in no enlargement of the powers of the Government. The Constitution is still the supreme law. If the people of any of the States have dropped out of their official relations with it, it is their duty, by their own voluntary acts, in accordance with their own laws, to resume those relations. With the right understanding of these practical questions the abstract definition of a State has but little to do. The ideas of the publicists on these subjects have but little relation to such a system of States and government as that of our American Union. The highest authority and safest guide for us on these questions is the Constitution itself.

We may say, in the language of a distinguished publicist, that a State is, "in its most enlarged sense, a self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights, and to do right and justice to foreigners." Or we may say, in the language of another, that "in a more limited sense, the word State expresses merely the positive or actual organization of the legislative and judicial powers." In other words, in one case, the State is made nearly synonymous with the people, and in the other with the Government. But none of these propositions can control the obvious intention of the Constitution, that the States should continue perpetually as component parts of the Union, with the perfect and guaranteed right of local self-government, in subordination to the rightful authority of the Federal Government.

It is substantially assumed by the same honorable gentleman that the closing of the southern ports during the war was a regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense of that expression, and that those ports could not have been closed if those States had the rights of States in the Union. But it is a mere perversion of terms to call a blockade a regulation of commerce. The blockade was merely the exercise of a belligerent right by the Federal Government as a war measure, a means to suppress the rebellion. The Supreme Court say, in the prize cases, that "one belligerent engaged in actual war has a right to blockade the ports of the other," and that, "to create this and other belligerent rights, as against neutrals, it is not necessary that the party claiming them should be at war with a separate and independent Power. The parties to a civil war are in the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest and have recourse to arms." The blockade was declared as a means of crippling the power of the rebellion. It in no way recognized the independence of the States whose ports were blockaded, or impaired their equal rights in the Union upon the restoration of peace. If it did, then the President or Congress could now, in time of profound peace, declare a valid blockade of the same ports, or Congress might now, in the adjustment of tariffs, give preferences to the ports of other States over those of the States lately in rebellion. But he would be a bold advocate of confusion and revolution who would maintain the right to exercise such powers now. I answer the honorable gentleman on these points by reference again to the decision of Judge Sprague in the case of the Amy Warwick, which commends itself alike by its sterling common sense, patriotic fidelity to the Constitution, and entire consistency with the principles of public law.

But, lest these doctrines of the practical independence of the southern confederacy, of the suicide of the rebel States, of the forfeiture of their rights as States, and of their corporate existence, or of whatever else it may be called, may not be entirely satisfactory to all, it is suggested that, if these rebel States are still in the Union, in a state of suspended animation, then, under the authority of the provision of the Constitution that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," they may be taken into a sort of national guardianship by the Federal Government, and constitutions formed for, or dictated to, them, that shall be republican in form. This doctrine would, certainly, be a very desirable one to the advocates of it if they were intrusted with the duty of making those constitutions. But let us inquire briefly into the proper construction of that provision in our Constitution. What does it mean?

It may be first observed, that this important provision is based upon the recognition of several principles of vital importance to the success and harmony of our system of government. It requires that the States to be dealt with under this power must be "States in this Union," and not foreign States, or States out of the Union, which are to be clothed in republican forms of government by Congress and then brought into the Union. If the latter kind of States desire admission into the Union, the duty of Congress is derived from the grant of power to admit new States.

It also requires that every State in this Union shall be entitled to have and maintain a separate State government, based on the right of the people to govern themselves through public organs of a representative character, chosen by themselves. Otherwise, their government would not be republican in form or substance.

It supposes that as the guarantee is of perpetual obligation, the Union and the States guaranteed shall also be perpetual, and that therefore no State has any right or power, by suicide, forfeiture, or otherwise, to destroy its republican form of government, its Statehood in the Union, or sever its connection with the Union. The States, in contemplation of law and of the Constitution, must continue to exist as States, and must exercise their right of self-government so far only in subordination to the Federal Government as their powers are limited by the Constitution of the United States.

The great object of this provision is to secure general harmony of fundamental principles of Government between the Union and States of which it is composed. It is not designed to secure a system of government in each State in which the local administration shall be exactly the same in form or principle as that in every other State. How much or how little power shall be imparted to the State government by the people of the State, what restrictions shall be imposed upon it, how many departments there shall be, what shall be the duties of each department, whether the Legislature shall consist of one or two branches, what shall be the official names of their officers, and all other matters relating to the internal affairs of the State, so its essential right of local self-government, are left by the Constitution of the United States to the sole determination of the people of the State, except in the few particulars in which powers are withheld from the States and the people by the Federal Constitution. That this provision does not imply a necessity for any precise form or uniform arrangement of State governments is rendered clear beyond doubt by the historical fact, that when it was adopted there were no two States in the Union whose State constitutions and forms of government did not differ in numerous and very important respects. Indeed, the State of Connecticut continued to exist under the royal charter, without any constitution in the American sense, until 1818, and the State of Rhode Island until a still more recent period.

It is, if possible, still more clear that this guarantee was not intended by its authors, or by the States or people, to secure a uniform rule or basis of suffrage in the several States as a necessary element in a "republican form of government." Such general suffrage as then prevailed in the States was, no doubt, considered an indispensable part of the republican system of government intended to be established in this country, but the contemporaneous regulations in the different States on the subject of suffrage were so diverse, both in extent and principle, as to render incontrovertible the conclusion that it was the intention of all parties, makers and people and States alike, that all matters pertaining to the basis of suffrage should be left to the exclusive control of the States respectively.

What, then, does this guarantee mean? Can we do better than to consult the fathers, the makers and earliest expounders of the Constitution, for an answer to this inquiry? Alexander Hamilton, in the twenty-first number of the Federalist, says:

"The inordinate pride of State importance has suggested to some minds an objection to the principle of a guarantee in the Federal Government as involving an officious interference in the domestic concerns of the members. A scruple of this kind would deprive us of one of the principal advantages to be expected from union, and can only flow from a misapprehension of the nature of the provision itself. It could be no impediment to the reforms of the State constitutions by a majority of the people in a legal and peaceable mode. This right would remain undiminished. The guarantee could only operate against changes to be effected by violence. Toward the prevention of calamities of this kind too many checks cannot be provided." A guarantee by the national authority would be as much directed against the usurpations of rulers as against the ferments and outrages of faction and sedition in the community."

James Madison, in the forty-third number of the Federalist, says:

"It may possibly be asked whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the State governments, without the concurrence of the States themselves. It may be answered that, if the General Government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican constitutions."

Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, quoting these opinions of Hamilton and Madison, says:

"The Federalist has spoken with so much force and propriety upon this subject that it supersedes all further reasoning."

Now, these expositions seem eminently reasonable and just, they are certainly worthy of the very highest respect, and then they have the singular merit of suggesting an interpretation that is in every respect practical and consistent with the great American principle of local self-government. They do not permit the Federal Government to embark upon a wild sea of experiment, or to depart from the safe anchorage of fundamental principle. They assign to the Federal Government the high duty of external protection, and leave to the people of the States the inalienable right of internal self-control. They give to the Federal Government no license or color of right to go into any State and assume the control or management of any of the domestic concerns or relations of the people of such State. These constitute the appropriate, peculiar, and exclusive subjects of State control; and they cannot be wisely or safely intrusted to any other. The States in these matters cannot be legally or constitutionally superseded by any "bureau" of the Federal Government.

In other words, that provision amounts only to a guarantee by the United States to the States of governments already established in the States respectively which are republican in form, and imposes upon the United States an obligation to protect the States in the enjoyment of such established governments against the wicked efforts of all enemies, either from within or without the States, by violence to overthrow or usurp or change them. Both authority and reason concur in this interpretation. It is in beautiful harmony with the doctrine of the reciprocal obligations arising out of our complex system of government between the Union and the States. It is also entirely consistent with every practical construction of it by our Government either before or during the rebellion.

There appears, therefore, to be no respectable color of authority under the provision in question for Congress to assume the guardianship of the States lately in rebellion, either as a conquered nation, or as States or as territory, or to ignore their continued statehood in the Union, or to govern them as dependencies or colonies of Congress, by agents and officers, military or civil, appointed by Congress. It affords still less countenance to the fatal doctrine that Congress may dictate forms of government to those States. That doctrine repudiates the most vital principle of our system of government—that the people are to be regarded as the sole original source of all political authority, that all legitimate government must rest upon their will. If a despotism or a permanent military government were established in any State by internal or external enemies, it would be the duty of Congress to overthrow it, because violative of every essential principle of republican government. But it would not, therefore, become the duty of Congress to frame and put in force another government in such State, for, as Mr. Madison says, the guarantee supposes a preëxisting government, republican in form, which, on the overthrow of such despotism or military government, merely resumes its sway over the State. If a new government is to be made, and not an old one revived, the people of the State must make it, not Congress. If there be two hostile parties in the State, the President or Congress may interpose to maintain order until the people can reconstruct their own government upon a republican basis. Here is to be found one of the strong foundation principles upon which the present Executive rests his effective and beneficent policy of restoration, by which he has already accomplished so many results alike surprising and encouraging to the country and to the friends of our Government throughout the world.

But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania attempts to destroy this foundation by the citation of an obiter dictum from the opinion of the late distinguished and excellent Chief Justice in the case of Luther vs. Borden, (7 Howard, page 1.) He is the same excellent Chief Justice whom the honorable gentleman informs the country he is afraid has been "damned to everlasting fire." And the honorable gentleman from Ohio cites the same dictum, and also an opinion from 1 Bishop on Criminal Law, in section one hundred and thirty-three, to the same effect, which rests upon no other authority than that dictum. The quotation is:

"Under this article of the Constitution [the one above cited] it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guaranty to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not."

This opinion of the Chief Justice was not called for by any question in the case decided by him. It is not incorporated into the statement of the decided points in the case by the reporter. To determine the appropriateness of it, as a passing comment by the judge, we must look into the facts of the case itself. The case was a common action of trespass for unlawfully entering another man's house to arrest him for alleged crime. It arose in 1842, and was commenced in the State of Rhode Island. The person making the arrest was acting under the authority of the established government of that State under its royal charter. The person arrested was claiming some authority under the new government of that State alleged to have been established by the people under the leadership of Thomas W. Dorr. The case therefore supposes two separate governments claiming to have lawful existence in the same State at the same time. Which was the legitimate government was the question to be settled in the case by the court. It was decided by the State court of Rhode Island, and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, to be the old charter government.

Does any such state of facts exist now? Is Congress called upon now to determine which of two governments in any southern State is the legitimate one? Do two delegations from any one State ask admission to Congress as representatives of two separate State governments in that State? There is no such case. The authority, therefore, has no weight. It is not inconsistent with the action or policy of the President toward the southern States. I believe two senatorial delegations do ask admission to the other end of the Capitol from the State of Louisiana, but both claim to represent the same State under the same State constitution and government. I believe also that one gentleman, not of the regular delegation to this House, from that State asks admission here as a delegate from the Territory of Louisiana, and is said to base his claim chiefly upon the suffrages of African citizens of that State. This hardly presents a case to which the remarks of Chief Justice Taney in the Rhode Island case are applicable. No law of Congress is needed to determine which set of Senators should be admitted to the Senate from the State of Louisiana. That question is referred by the Constitution of the United States to the exclusive adjudication of the Senate itself.

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

It is due to the whole country, and especially to the States in question, that each branch of this Congress should assert its own dignity and resume the exercise of its own functions in this particular, and receive and consider and decide for itself the applications of Representatives for admission to it from southern States. Any other course can only work injustice, mischief, and strife.

It may be further remarked, in connection with the case of Luther against Borden, that Congress never did decide which of the two governments in Rhode Island was the legitimate one; but the President of the United States did, and the court in that case say that he was fully authorized so to decide, and that his decision was binding upon the court. The present Executive was met by no such embarrassment. There has never ceased to be a government in every southern State that, in the sense of the framers of our Constitution, was "republican in form," except in so far as they attempted, by changes in their constitutions, to deny the rightful authority of the Federal Government. But the administration of those governments was usurped during the rebellion. That usurpation has been completely overthrown and abandoned. Most of those governments are again committed to the control and administration of officers chosen according to their own requirements. The interposition of the Executive has been such only as seemed to him to be necessary to enable the people to effect the reorganizations of their former rightful governments. He has also urged the adoption by them of certain measures which were necessary to insure more harmonious submission by the people of those States to proper Federal authority. No patriot, North or South, should complain on account of such recommendations, nor withhold from the people of those States great praise for the prompt and cheerful manner in which they have adopted them.

It may also be observed in connection with the same case, and as illustrating the true interpretation of the provision guarantying to the States governments "republican in form," that the government in Rhode Island, held by the President in 1842, and by the Supreme Court in 1848, to be "republican in form," and, therefore, as good as the United States was bound to guaranty to that State, was the same government organized and maintained under the charter granted in 1663 by Charles II to the "Governor and Company of the English Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in New England in America," and that, under that republican government, in 1842, no man was entitled to vote unless he was a freeholder, an owner of land. That State must needs have been divided into small sections to give many citizens a chance to become qualified to vote. It was not thought then that Rhode Island needed to be reconstructed by Congress. The constitution of that State now requires that the right of suffrage shall only be exercised by persons owning real estate worth $184 each, or having an equivalent rental value.

It is maintained by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] that Congress acquires such powers to take charge of the States lately in rebellion as are necessary to enable it to accomplish the ends desired by him, from the last clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which recites, after the preceding enumeration of the powers of Congress:

"And to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Mr. Speaker, there are but few provisions in our Constitution that have heretofore challenged more elaborate and profound examination, either by courts or statesmen, than the one just quoted; and I supposed that a conclusion had been reached, alike obligatory upon the courts and Congress, and satisfactory to the people. That conclusion, expressed in the language of Justice Story, is that—

"The plain import of the clause is, that Congress shall have all the incidental and instrumental powers necessary and proper to carry into execution all the express powers. It neither enlarges any power specially granted, nor is it a grant of any new power to Congress; but it is merely a declaration for the removal of all uncertainty, that the means of carrying into execution those otherwise granted are included in the grant. Whenever, therefore, a question arises concerning the constitutionality of a particular power the first question is, whether the power be expressed in the Constitution. If it be, the question is decided. If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be whether it is properly an incident to an express power, and necessary to its execution. If it be, then it may be exercised by Congress; if not, Congress can not exercise it."—Story on the Constitution, sec. 1243.

This opinion is substantially concurred in by no less competent and distinguished personages than Alexander Hamilton, (Federalist, No. 33,) James Madison, (Federalist, No. 44,) Thomas Jefferson, and James Monroe, and nearly every other statesman of past times in our country. I think the country will be content with this construction, so deliberately given, and by such unselfish patriots, and will not suffer itself long to hanker after the exercise of ungranted power for the purpose of prolonging an estrangement that appeals so loudly for the healing counsels of peace and union. The power sought by the honorable gentleman must find a more substantial foundation than the one on which he has seen fit to rest it. It should have an abiding place in some express grant of power, or should arise by a fair and just implication from such a grant. If there had been any such in the Constitution, it is fair to presume that that learned gentleman would have cited it. It is not there. It would be extraordinary, indeed, if it were. It would be a most dangerous power to repose anywhere, except in the collective body of the people. It is asked in reference to the States lately in rebellion—

"Where does the Constitution of the United States lodge the power to prescribe an effective remedy for this impaired vitality, and to restore to healthy action these suspended functions?"

I would answer that, so far as external aid is required, it should come from the President, in the form of amnesty, with such exceptions and qualifications as the future and permanent welfare of the country demand; but after these things are done, the physician who is invested with the constitutional right and natural capacity to prescribe an effective remedy for this impaired vitality, and to restore to healthy action these suspended functions, is the people of those States respectively. Their right to self-government was not sacrificed by their attempted separation from the Union, except so far as they may be individually deprived thereof by conviction of crime. That right has not become the property of Congress. It belongs to the people. And Congress is not even their guardian in matters of local State government. Those States are either in the Union or out of it. If they are only half in, for the purpose of being governed by Congress, they might as well be entirely out, for there would then be no more difficulty in governing them by Congress; besides, if they were entirely out, as is boldly claimed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and others, there would then be less dispute about the right of Congress to govern them. But Mr. Lincoln, in his first inaugural, said:

"In contemplation of universal law, and of the Constitution, the union of the States is perpetual."

And,

"It follows from these views that no State, upon its own mere motion, can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void."

And the present Executive says the same thing, and is acting, in the discharge of his solemn duties, consistently therewith.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] assumes that those States are out of the Union, and can only come in as new States, and the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] "for the sake of the argument," assumes that the position of the Executive that they are still in the Union is correct, but both gentlemen and their followers strike hands in their determination to keep them out of Congress, and not recognize them as vitalized and acting members of the Union until certain constitutional amendments can be adopted by the other States and put into operation as the supreme law of the land; until, in other words, a new Constitution, a new Federal Government, can be formed, without their cooperation or consent, into which, and into obedience to which, they shall afterward be compelled to come. It strikes me that would be reconstructing the Union with a vengeance. We will change the Constitution to suit our views; we will change the qualifications for members of Congress so that no man who participated in the rebellion shall ever be eligible to a seat in the Senate or House; we will change the basis of representation in Congress so that none but voters shall be counted; we will give Congress the right to impose duties on exports from States so that we can tax the cotton raised in the South at the rate of $100,000,000 per annum or more; we will give to Congress the right to legislate for and control the negro population of the States in their relations and intercourse with the white population; we will give to Congress the right to make uniform the civil rights of the people of all the States, so that under the cover of that right it may regulate the right of suffrage in the States, and thereby control the States themselves, and revolutionize and centralize the Government; we will, by way of anticipation, insert into the Constitution express prohibitions upon the States and the people against doing any mean or wicked things in the future; and then, all these things done, we will not invite the southern States to come into the Union and enjoy with us this new order of things, but we will make them come in; and then we will boast of our glorious system of self-government, and claim that all rightful government rests upon the consent of the governed.

Mr. Speaker, it is not in this way that the genius of free government can be illustrated; that enduring peace can be secured; that national prosperity can be reestablished; that fraternal intercourse between the sections of our country can be restored; that confidence and content can be brought back to the people of the South; that the malignant elements of discord can be kept out of our national councils, or that the bleeding wounds of our country and our countrymen can be healed. Such policy, in my humble judgment, if the power to enforce it were clear beyond doubt, would be most unwise and suicidal.

"It is excellent
To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
To use it like a giant."

Mr. Speaker, so far as the President is concerned, I beg leave to say that I only know him as the chief Executive of the Union. I do not enjoy his confidence or that of any gentleman in his Administration, so far as I am advised. I only know that in the discharge of the important duties committed to me, under the guidance of my own judgment and conscience, enlightened somewhat by the wisdom and examples of the past, I am compelled to choose between the policy adopted by the Executive for the restoration of the Union and that advocated by the majority on this floor, and to approve the former, because I believe it to be right and consistent with the supreme law and the highest good of the country. I think those States should be permitted to resume their connection with the Union. Their Representatives should be admitted to Congress if they come here with the requisite "qualifications" under the Constitution, which should be determined by each House for itself, and not by either or both for the other. It need not be expected that they will always send here men of sound discretion, of prudent self-possession, whose conduct will always be unexceptionable. Nor will they do so any more if they are kept out for an indefinite number of years. No section of our country has ever attained such excellence in its representation here, nor will it ever, until the high noon of a political millennium yet only dreamed of by the Utopian. In free Governments, the highest good is only realized as the fruit of the freest conflict of opinions, of truth with error. Out of such contests, truth always gains the ultimate and lasting victory. But by every day that these States are kept out of their proper relations to the Union, the chances for a speedy restoration of sentiments of confidence, sympathy, good will, and genuine nationality, which are above all things desirable, will be diminished, and ultimate success made more difficult.

I deprecate, as alike dangerous to the peace and happiness of our country and subversive of the true and most conservative principles of our Government, that fatal policy which would erect in this Capitol a great consolidation and centralization of power. In my judgment, there is not to be found in the pathway of either the Union or the States to the perfection of human government so great a danger as this. It threatens a system of constantly recurring encroachments by the Federal Government upon the cherished principle of local self-government. The continual demand for more power to be conferred upon the General Government should alarm every patriot in the land. The General Government was not created to administer the local, private, or personal interests of the people. It is ill adapted to the discharge of such duties. The duties imposed on it are chiefly external, general, international. It was intended by the fathers to cherish and protect, not to war upon, the vital principle of self-governing communities—States, counties, townships, and cities—which are the only competent and safe guardians of that great mass of power which presides over the administration of the daily affairs and fireside interests of society. This power will always be best administered the nearer the power itself, and the agents by which it works, are brought to the people to be affected by it, and the more directly its agents are made answerable to them. This intimate relation between power, its agents, and the people, constitutes the only school in which the capacity for self-government can be developed, and that feeling of deep, abiding, active, personal responsibility in the citizen cultivated and strengthened which is so necessary to fit him at once to appreciate and to protect both the general and the local governments. It is only by the freest operation of this principle that that individuality can be acquired by the citizen and imparted by him to the State which is necessary to develop and preserve the highest interests and greatest good of both. The surest guarantee for the perpetuity, prosperity, and happiness of our country can be found in the faithful observance by both the Federal and State Governments of the respective limitations upon their power and the faithful discharge by each of its appropriate duties without interference with the other, which is but yielding obedience to that great principle of local self-government which constitutes the chief kernel of eternal truth which has borne such beneficent fruit to our country in the past.

In the eager search after radical power on which to erect Federal bureaus and other machinery for the control by Congress of the domestic affairs of the States, it is claimed to be found in the last amendment of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

It is claimed that the last clause grants power to Congress not only to prevent the reenslavement of the negro, but to assume the special control of him, and to take him out of the control of the States of whose population he is a part, in order to secure to him at least all civil rights that are enjoyed by the white people, and, as claimed by some, to secure to him equal political rights with the white men, both as a citizen of the State and of the United States. I deny this construction as being most untenable upon every rational principle of constitutional interpretation. The States by the adoption of this amendment certainly did not mean to surrender to Congress their cherished right of exclusive government over their own citizens in all matters of domestic concern. They only intended by this amendment to abolish slavery and forever prevent its reestablishment in any part of the country.

Its great object is to prevent the acquisition by man of property in his fellow-man in such manner as to enable him to extort from the latter involuntary service. Such legislation only is authorized by this amendment as is necessary to prevent these things. This purpose is plain, and requires but a slight effort of honest reflection to understand it. The second clause, in my judgment, adds nothing to the power given to Congress by the first. This view is sustained by every approved interpretation of analogous provisions in the Constitution. Here I refer again to section 1243 of Story's Commentaries on that instrument, already cited by me. Slavery was a domestic relation, not a public relation. It was a relation between individuals which gave to one of them the power to control the will and conduct of the other. The severance of that relation puts an end to slavery, and was the beneficent object of this amendment. But the regulation of the ordinary civil relations of the negro to the society in which he lives, by the enactment of laws of a local and merely municipal character to control his contracts, and bestow upon him civil privileges having no necessary connection with his personal freedom, are wholly unauthorized by any warrant in any part of the Constitution. And any attempt to do such things will be simply revolutionary of the most valuable principles of our Government, and cannot fail sooner or later to lead to the establishment of a centralized and consolidated Government but little better than a despotism.

I now come to the consideration more in detail of the bill now pending before the House, for the extension of the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau. It involves principles of the gravest importance, that should receive the most careful and deliberate attention by every member of this House.

I oppose the bill because it proposes, as it now stands on our files, to create and perpetuate in this country an institution or a bureau as permanent in every respect, as all-pervading in every respect, as any other Department of the Government of the United States. It proposes not as heretofore to confine this Freedmen's Bureau to the States lately in rebellion, but to extend it to all the States wherever you may find freedmen or refugees: in other words, the future jurisdiction of this bureau is to be co-extensive with the Union itself.

Now, sir, it seems to me when Congress undertakes by this kind of law to take the guardianship of an entire class of people on itself, and constitute them the wards of the Federal Government, and constitute the Federal Government the special guardian and protector and comptroller of that class, it undertakes to do something for which there can be found in our Constitution no shadow of warrant. Therefore I am opposed to this bill. I take it to be the duty of a faithful Representative here, both as a good citizen of the country and as a sworn officer of the Government, to consider, when a proposition of this sort is submitted to him, whether Congress possesses the power which the measure proposes to exercise. Applying that rule to this bill, I feel compelled to say, after most diligent search through the Constitution of the country, and applying to that a liberal rule of interpretation, I am unable to find any shadow of authority, any single line or warrant for any such exercise of power as this bill proposes. It will not be pretended this power is found in any express grant of the Constitution.

From what express power can it be fairly implied? I know of none. Why should Congress undertake to control, to govern, to educate, to feed, to procure homes and farms, for freedmen and refugees any more than for any other class of citizens of this country whose necessities might be as great, and who appeal as strongly to the sympathies of members of this House and to the whole country? The attempt to exercise so radical a power as this cannot fail to excite in the minds of the people of this country a well-grounded fear that there exists here a settled and deliberate and wicked purpose on the part of Congress, to a very great extent, to disregard the limitations upon its own power contained in the Constitution, and subvert the essential and fundamental principles of that Government by their legislation here, and attempt to build up in this country an institution, under the influence and patronage of the Federal Government, which has no other purpose and can accomplish no other end than to gratify the wild whims and crotchets of a reckless fanaticism. The people who are proposed to be controlled by this bill are as much citizens of the States where they live as any other class of citizens. They constitute as much a part of the population of the States where they reside as we do of the States we represent; just as much as any other class of men in the country do. Why, then, should we single them out and make them the special beneficiaries of congressional protection? They are free men. They need no guardianship but the fostering care of their own local State governments.

Now, I will invite attention for a little while to the details of this bill; and in this connection I invite correction from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Eliot,] if I make any statement not authorized by the bill. This bill proposes to create a permanent bureau for the control of freedmen and refugees, at the head of which there shall be a Commissioner with a salary of $3,000; the country may be divided into a number of sub-districts not to exceed twelve; and there may be appointed a number of assistant commissioners who shall not exceed the number of districts, with a salary for each of $2,500; to the chief Commissioner there may be assigned by the Secretary of War ten clerks, the salaries of whom I am unable from the bill to determine. Each of the assistant commissioners may have three clerks with a compensation that shall not exceed $1,000.

Then the entire country from Texas to Maine, and from South Carolina to Oregon, may be divided into sub-districts, which shall consist each of a county or parish. For each of these sub-districts, which possibly may be equal in number to the whole number of counties and parishes in the Union, there may be assigned one or more sub-agents with a salary of from $500 to $1,200 per annum, according to the amount of service rendered by them respectively, and to each of those sub-agents, if necessary in the opinion of the Commissioner, there may be assigned one clerk, at an annual salary not exceeding $1,000 each.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that involves the creation of a small army of agents and commissioners, whose jurisdiction and control shall pervade the whole country, shall extend into every State, into every congressional district, into every county, into every township and city of this broad Union, provided only that they can find some freedmen or refugees upon whom to exercise their jurisdiction. I submit that before a measure of this kind should be adopted, we should reflect most carefully upon what we are doing. We should remember that this country is now almost crushed into the very earth with its accumulated burden of public debt, of State debts, of county debts, of city debts, of township debts, of individual debts. We should bear in mind that we may impose upon the people of this country by this kind of latitudinarian and most dangerous legislation a burden that is too heavy to be borne, and against which the day may come when the people, as one man, will feel themselves called upon to protest in such a manner as forever to overthrow that kind of legislation and condemn to merited reproach those who favor it.

This bill, taken in connection with the report of the present Commissioner of the bureau, proposes to require at the hands of Congress an appropriation of nearly twelve million dollars. That is almost equal to the annual expense of our entire Government during the first two or three Administrations. They propose in addition to that very great outlay to authorize the officers of the Government who shall have more or less connection with the administration of this bureau to expend unlimited sums of money.

In this connection I invite attention to the third section of the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of War, in his own discretion, without being restrained by any limitation upon its exercise, by any safeguards of any kind, to expend in behalf of these freedmen and refugees such supplies of provisions, clothing, fuel, medical stores, and transportation as shall be necessary from time to time for their protection and to advance their interests. Where is the limit upon the exercise of that great power by that officer? There is none. He may charter railroads to transport them for place to place. He may do for them what they, and they alone, should do for themselves.

It may be said that he is acting under the obligation of an oath of office, and that he stands in high position, and is surrounded therefore by all those motives which ordinarily prompt honorable men to discharge in a proper way and within proper limits their official duties. But let me call the attention of this House to the fact that in the practical administration of the affairs of this Government in its various departments there is not always that nice regard for the proprieties of official action that ought always to characterize public officials. I need not at this day invite attention to the fact that even high Government officers may err. They may suffer their judgment to be warped or controlled by their feelings. They may suffer themselves to be led astray from the strict path of official duty by partisan feelings. I do not know what the present officers might do, but I do say that the danger of their doing it is at least great enough to justify us, whose duty it is, to surround them with such guards and limitations as will prevent its occurrence.

Taking that section, then, as it reads, I submit that it is within the power of the Secretary of War, in addition to the $12,000,000 that the Commissioner asks for now, to expend $12,000,000 more—ay, twenty, thirty, one hundred millions more, upon this same class of men, women, and children.

Then let me invite attention to the provision of the fourth section of this act. It is proposed to set aside a certain portion of the public lands in the States of Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, not exceeding in the number of acres three millions, for the exclusive use of the freedmen and refugees. It is made the duty of the Commissioner who shall control this bureau, under certain limitations and regulations, to assign these public lands in quantities of forty acres to the use and occupancy of these freedmen and refugees.

Now, so far as that appropriation is concerned, I will not question the propriety or justice of it, although the manner of its execution is very defective. I am in favor of allowing these people to acquire land in the country, and to become owners of homesteads, just as much as any other class of men, and upon just the same terms as any other class of men in the country. I am in favor, upon principle, of allowing every man in the country to become a land-owner. The people of this country will thus become better citizens; they will acquire a more direct and active interest in the Government, and will necessarily become more intelligent and orderly citizens, and better men.

But this section does not stop here. It proposes to go further, and to make the Commissioner of the bureau, under the Federal Government, a sort of grand landlord of all these freedmen and refugees who shall see fit, for the time being, to squat upon these public lands. In other words, these public lands are not to be assigned to these freedmen and refugees as purchases merely, but antecedent to the time when they are expected to become able to purchase them, they are to be allowed to rent the lands of the Federal Government, and become tenants of the Government, and to pay a certain prescribed rate of rent for the use of the lands.

Now, I would like to know, and I should certainly be grateful to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] if he would inform me, where it is in the Constitution that the power is vested to create this kind of department in the Federal Government, to make this Government a landlord, to make this Government a great proprietor for the purpose of cultivating its own public domain. I can find no such power anywhere, nor have I heard any gentleman here undertake to point out where it is to be found.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am more especially opposed to this bill on account of the provisions of the fifth section, which I will now read:

That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KERR. I yield for a moment.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to make a statement to the House in regard to that order of General Sherman. There is in the hands of the President at this moment a declaration, which I have seen, written by General Sherman and signed by him, declaring that when he made that order, or when he gave to the freedmen a place of refuge by that order, his purpose was not to give them a permanent title in the land, but to secure them only a temporary possession, a possessory title, for the purpose of giving homes to the camp-followers who were old and decrepid. He purposely and specially excepted from that order all able-bodied men, and never dreamed that his order would carry with it the shadow of a title. He did not intend to assume, as the declaration in this section goes to show, that he could invade the rights of property or grant titles under a military order. He repudiates the whole doctrine assumed by this section. That letter should now be before the country, and in the hands of this House. It was in my hands to present to this House, but owing to the delay consequent on the debate, I withdrew my claim to present it, and it was given to my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] to present to this House.

I make this statement in order that the gentleman, in making his argument upon this bill, may understand the exact position that General Sherman takes, and that neither General Sherman nor any other officer may be dragged into this attempt to usurp legislative power under military orders.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. ELIOT. With the leave of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] I will say a few words in reply to what has just fallen from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] I understand him to say, and I desire to see if I understand him correctly, that a letter has been written by General Sherman to the President, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] was requested to communicate to this House, and which he has left in the hands of his colleague, [Mr. RAYMOND,] expecting that he would do it. Am I right?

Mr. CHANLER. Not exactly.

Mr. KERR. I hold in my hand that Order No. 15, of General Sherman. If it will relieve gentlemen of this cross-discussion, I will incorporate the material part of it in my remarks.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] to admit that I am correct in what I supposed he intended to say—that he was authorized either by General Sherman or the President to communicate that letter to this House.

Mr. CHANLER. No such thing. I will not delay the argument of my friend from Indiana [Mr. KERR] by undertaking to reply to the very unfair insinuation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT.] But I will say that I had nothing to do with General Sherman or the President. I only stated the fact that such a paper as that was seen by me, and that it had been placed in the hands of my colleague, [Mr. RAYMOND.]

Mr. GRINNELL. When was it written?

Mr. CHANLER. It may have been written within forty-eight hours, so far as I know. I made the declaration that such a letter has been written; that it was written at the express request of the President; I had nothing further to do with it.

Mr. ELIOT. I understood the gentleman to say it was put in his hands to communicate to this House.

Mr. CHANLER. I did say I had been requested to communicate it to this House.

Mr. ELIOT. By whom?

Mr. CHANLER. I will not say. The gentleman knows as well as I do, and he can make the declaration. But his object now is to throw a doubt or some slur upon my statement. He knows the truth of my assertion. I made the statement merely in order that my friend from Indiana [Mr. KERR] in his argument should make no mistake on this point. I am doing it in fair play to him, and not for the purpose of interrupting or embarrassing his argument.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman declines to say how he received this information. I know, but I shall not say if he does not.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen that letter, and I take it upon myself to say that the gentleman from New York has not stated its contents correctly. It is no purpose of mine to cast a slur upon the motives of anybody; and if the gentleman had known me better he would have withheld what he has seen fit to say upon that subject. The letter to which he refers does undertake to state what were the motives or intentions of the distinguished general in making the order which is known as Special Order No. 15; and it may hereafter be well enough for this House to determine whether the motives of that general in his action in this case are so much to be regarded as to what he did. It is the order that concerns us, not the motives of the general who made it.

In that letter it is stated that the order making allotments was not intended to operate permanently. This bill does not assume that it was designed to operate permanently, but only until some other order should interfere with it or until legislation should be had; and by this bill we seek to consummate the legislation which was contemplated in that order.

As to the statement that General Sherman, in his letter or by his order, repudiated the idea that there were to be upon those allotments men who were not aged or infirm, that, according to my recollection, is not correct. General Sherman did state that there were young and able-bodied men who it was desirable should be in the Army of the United States as soldiers. So it is stated in the order; by that order they are invited to enlist, and under it they did enlist. General Sherman does state in his letter that it was supposed that these allotments were many of them to be for the benefit of the old, the infirm, and of women while their husbands or male friends were absent in the service of the country. So the order states. But I respectfully say that it is not correct to affirm that General Sherman in his letter places upon his former action such a construction as to bring it in conflict with the provisions of this bill.

Several MEMBERS. Let us have the letter.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] where that letter is.

Mr. ELIOT. I suppose that it is in the hands of the commissioner of South Carolina.

Mr. KERR. If the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts will present that letter, I will give way for that purpose.

Mr. ELIOT. Why, sir, I had not the letter in my hands for five minutes. It was to-day shown to me in company with my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and was read by both of us.

Mr. KERR. Has the gentleman that letter now in his possession?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly I have not. It is, I suppose, in the hands of the party who obtained it from the President. It was a letter addressed by General Sherman to the President, and will, I have no doubt, find its way in some manner to this House. I have it not, or I would produce it with great pleasure.

Mr. KERR. I will read the first paragraph of that famous field order, No. 15:

"The islands from Charleston south, the abandoned rice fields along the rivers for thirty miles back from the sea, and the country bordering the St. John's river, Florida, are reserved and set apart for the settlement of the negroes now made free by the acts of war and the proclamation of the President of the United States."

Much has been said as to the intentions of the distinguished general by whom this order was promulgated. I know not what were the intentions in his own mind at the time. Nor is it material to know what they were. The order is now history, a public record, and must be so considered. But I doubt not the general's intention was in harmony with correct legal construction.* There is a legal rule by which we may all determine for ourselves from the face of the order what were the intentions of the distinguished general who made it. It is a rule of interpretation that when an officer of the Government makes an order of this kind he intends to go just so far and no further than he has legal power to go; that he means no assumption of power he does not possess.

* General Sherman's letter referred to:

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of February 1, and, in compliance with your request, I inclose herewith a copy of field order No. 15, of 1865, with this brief history of the origin and reasons for making it:

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, came to Savannah soon after its occupation by the forces under my command, and conferred freely with me as to the best method to provide for the vast number of negroes who had followed the army from the interior of Georgia, as also of those who had already congregated on the island near Hilton Head, and were still coming into our lines. We agreed perfectly that the young and able-bodied men should be enlisted as soldiers, or employed by the Quartermaster in the necessary work of unloading ships and for other army purposes; but this left on our hands the old and feeble, the women and children, who had necessarily to be fed by the United States.

Mr. Stanton summoned a large number of the old negroes, mostly preachers, with whom he held a long conference, of which he took down notes. After this conference he was satisfied that the negroes could, with some little aid from us, by means of the abandoned plantations on the sea islands and along the navigable rivers, take care of themselves. He requested me to draw up a plan that would be uniform and practicable. I made the rough draft, and we went over it very carefully. Mr. Stanton making many changes, and the present order No. 15 resulted and were made public.

I knew, of course, we could not convey the title to land, and merely provided possessory titles to be good so long as war and our military power lasted. I merely aimed to make provisions for the negroes who were absolutely dependent on us, leaving the value of their possession to be determined by after events or legislation. At that time, January, 1865, it will be remembered that the tone of the people of the South was very defiant, and no one could tell when the period of war would cease; therefore I did not contemplate that event as being so near at hand.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN, Major General.

To ANDREW JOHNSON, President of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] allow me to say one word of explanation in reference to this letter of General Sherman?

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state my recollection of the communication made by the commissioner of South Carolina. When he came to-day and showed this letter to the honorable chairman of the freedmen's committee [Mr. ELIOT] and myself, I thought that, as a member of the House, I ought to know how came General Sherman to be writing any letters on the subject. I therefore ventured to make that inquiry, to which the commissioner of South Carolina, according to my present recollection—of course the honorable chairman of the committee will correct me if I am mistaken—replied that the President had made the request of General Sherman. As I understand the matter, General Sherman simply made a respectful answer in accordance with the request of the President of the United States.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, viewing this document as a legal paper demanding a legal interpretation, I proceed to say that, in my judgment, General Sherman by this order only accomplished this much: he took possession during war of a prescribed territory of the enemy in the exercise of a belligerent right, which he as general in command of the armies of the Government in that department had the right to do, and General Sherman never attempted by anything contained in this order, because he had no power to accomplish such a result, to give to these freedmen and refugees any title to the lands in question. The act of General Sherman was simply the exercise of a belligerent right. It could exist only so long as the belligerency existed. The moment peace was restored, the moment war ceased, this order ceased to have validity or vitality. I say, therefore, the moment this war terminated this order became void. It had spent its force. It had accomplished its end. It had done its full office, and could do no more. I take it to be the law, both the international and public law of this country, that no Government can take property of this kind from one citizen and give it to another. No Government by a mere act of legislation can divest a title from one party and vest it in another.

Now, in sustaining my position on that point, and to show the House and the country that I am sustained by authority of the highest rank, I beg leave to quote two or three pertinent authorities.

I will first cite Halleck's International Law, page 456, paragraph twelve:

"Private property on land is now, as a general rule of war, exempt from seizure or confiscation; and this general exemption extends even to cases of absolute and unqualified conquest. Even where the conquest of a country is confirmed by the unconditional relinquishment of sovereignty by the former owner, there can be no general or partial transmutation of private property in virtue of any rights of conquest. That which belonged to the Government of the vanquished passes to the victorious State, which also takes the place of the former sovereign in respect to the right of eminent domain; but private rights and private property, both movable and immovable, are in general unaffected by the operations of a war, whether such operations be limited to mere military occupation or extend to complete conquest. Some modern text-writers—Hautefeuille, for example—contend for the ancient rule, that private property on land is subject to seizure and confiscation. They are undoubtedly correct with respect to the general abstract right, as deduced from the law of nature and ancient practice; but while the general right continues, modern usage, and the opinions of modern text-writers of the highest authority, have limited this right by establishing the rule of general exemption."

I will now read a short extract from the decision of Judge Sprague of the district of Massachusetts, already referred to.

Judge Sprague says:

"An objection to the prize decisions of the district court has arisen from an apprehension of radical consequences. It has been supposed that if the Government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges, and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms. This is an error, a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent rights cannot be exercised when there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute and unlimited sovereign rights. But no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile Power, either from without or within a nation, takes possession and holds absolute dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation by force of arms expels or overthrows the enemy, and suppresses hostilities, it acquires no new title, but merely regains the possession of which it had been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights. During the war of 1812 the British took possession of Castine, and held exclusive and unlimited control over it as conquered territory. Castine was restored to us under the treaty of peace, but it was never supposed that the United States acquired a new title by the treaty, and could therefore govern it as conquered territory."

And in this same connection I will cite from the same author another brief extract. I will remark, however, that upon the principles of public law, as well as the Constitution of our country, when a rebellion or insurrection is suppressed by the legitimate Government, the Government itself may have the right, as against the individuals lately in rebellion or insurrection, to consider them as individual offenders against the laws of the country, and it may denounce against them as such offenders the punishment which their crimes deserve. But under those principles, I say it is not competent, by a mere declaration of the Government or a mere law of Congress, to take from the people of any section such property without proof of guilt, without proceedings to confiscate their estates, without taking any of the steps required by the Constitution, where it says that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. I say that when the Government desires to take from one citizen his property and give it to another, or make it the Government's own property, it must do it by proceeding in pursuance of law against the offender himself.

Judge Sprague says, in answer to this view of the case:

"Under despotic Governments the power of municipal confiscation may be unlimited; but under our Government the right of sovereignty over any portion of a State is given and limited by the Constitution, and will be the same after the war as it was before. When the United States take possession of any rebel district, they acquire no new title, but merely vindicate that which previously existed, and are to do only what is necessary for that purpose. Confiscations of property, not for any use that has been made of it, which go not against any offending thing, but are inflicted for the personal delinquency of the owner, are punitive, and punishments should be inflicted only upon due conviction of personal guilt."

In the same connection I will invite attention to the opinion of Alexander Hamilton, one of the earliest, greatest publicists of this country. In replying to those who represent the confiscation or sequestration of debts as our best means of retaliation and coercion, as our most powerful, and sometimes as our only means of defense, he says:

"So degrading an idea will be rejected with disdain by every man who feels a true and well-informed national pride; by every man who recollects and glories that in a state of still greater immaturity we achieved independence without the aid of this dishonorable expedient. The Federal Government never resorted to it, and a few only of the State governments stained themselves with it."—Hamilton's Works, vol. 7, p. 329.

One more authority, too pertinent to be omitted, is from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, in the United States vs. Percheman, 7 Peter's Reports, page 86:

"It may not be unworthy of remark that it is very unusual even in cases of conquest for the conqueror to do more than to displace the sovereign and assume dominion over the country. The modern usage of nations, which has become law, would be violated, that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private property should be generally confiscated and private rights annulled."

Now, resting my opinion on these authorities, I insist that Congress has now no legal or constitutional right in time of peace, when there are no belligerents, to go into the States named in that order, or any other State, and take even the possession of the lands of the people from the owners and give them to anybody else. Much less have we any right to take from them the fee, the absolute estate in those lands. This kind of legislation can only be designed to operate as a punishment, not against the thing taken, but against the land-owner. The authorities say that this kind of punishment can only be inflicted after due proceedings against the respective owners for the purpose of confiscation or punishment in some way prescribed by law under the Constitution of the country. This attempt on the part of this House and of Congress to act upon the assumption that war is still flagrant in this country I look upon as being radically and wickedly wrong. War does not prevail now. On the contrary, peace prevails throughout our entire boundaries. There is no army anywhere arrayed against the Federal authority. There is no individual man in this country that is now holding out any resistance to the Government. The Executive has announced officially to the country, to Congress, and to the world that the rebellion is now suppressed; that the States in the South have returned to obedience to law, and that the laws are now being enforced and observed in the South.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will he be good enough to state when and where the Executive has made any such announcement as that to which he refers; and whether the latest outgoing from that Department of the Government has not been that contained in the opinion of the Attorney General conveyed to the Senate by the President, which is to the effect that the war against the rebellious States was not yet ended?

Mr. KERR. I know well what the Attorney General has said; and while I entertain toward that officer high personal regard, based upon a very pleasant personal acquaintance, I beg leave respectfully to say here that in my judgment the position upon that subject assumed by him in that communication is as radically wrong in principle and in fact as the other position to which I have referred here.

I prefer to take the announcement of the President himself, as he knows what the facts are. We all know, in spite of the letter of the Attorney General, that there is no war in this country. It is a patent, notorious, and undeniable fact that there is no enemy in arms anywhere. Gentlemen must not undertake in this country to perpetuate a war upon paper. They have no right to keep asunder the different sections of this nation upon any assumed or imaginary state of hostilities until they can accomplish certain cherished partisan purposes.

I have not the communication of the President at my desk now, but will incorporate it in my remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to ask the gentleman when and where the President had made the announcement to which he referred.

Mr. KERR. The statement is contained in the answer of the President in reply to a resolution of the Senate, and is dated December 18, 1865, and accompanied the letter of Lieutenant General Grant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the gentleman will look in vain for anything of the sort in that letter.

Mr. KERR. Let the letter speak for itself. It reads as follows on the point in question:

To the Senate of the United States:

In reply to the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 12th instant, I have the honor to state that the rebellion waged by a portion of the people against the properly constituted authorities of the Government of the United States has been suppressed; that the United States are in possession of every State in which the insurrection existed; and that, as far as could be done, the courts of the United States have been restored, post offices reestablished, and steps taken to put into effective operation the revenue laws of the country.

As the result of the measures instituted by the Executive, with the view of inducing a resumption of the functions of the States comprehended in the inquiry of the Senate, the people in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee, have reorganized their respective State governments, and "are yielding obedience to the laws and Government of the United States" with more willingness and greater promptitude than under the circumstances could reasonably have been anticipated. The proposed amendment to the Constitution, providing for the abolition of slavery forever within the limits of the country, has been ratified by each one of these States, with the exception of Mississippi, from which no official information has yet been received; and in nearly all of them measures have been adopted or are now pending to confer upon freedmen rights and privileges which are essential to their comfort, protection, and security.

Now, a word more. I am opposed to this bill on other grounds. Let us see what it proposes to accomplish in other respects. The commissioners and assistant commissioners and sub-agents and clerks in this bureau are made, as it were, absolute and exclusive governors and rulers of the freedmen and refugees of this country. There is to be built up within the States of this Union by this bill a sort of imperium in imperio, a sort of government within a government. It is an attempt upon the part of the Federal Government, in other words, to usurp and take from the States their sacred and inalienable right to control and govern their own people in all matters relating to their domestic and local interests.

But not only that. This bill proposes to make it the duty of the Executive, when this bureau shall be organized all over this country, to come to the rescue of all these various officers with the military power of the Union. The bill says in the second section:

And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act, or the act to which it is additional."

What does that mean? Are we to have organized all over this country a system of petty tribunals, to be at once protected by and to perform their duties according to the rules of military or martial law, and to be wholly independent of and superior to the States, and all the civil tribunals of the States where they exist? The inquiry may well strike the mind with utter incredulity, the thing proposed is so strikingly inconsistent with the genius of our boasted institutions. But it is true. And it is not relieved by the provision of section eight, that—

The jurisdiction conferred by this and the preceding section on the officers and agents of this bureau shall cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice—because, by its terms, that section relates alone to the jurisdiction conferred by sections seven and eight. All the powers conferred by the other sections operate without limit as to time or territory. In all my observations in the business of making laws I never yet had occasion to analyze a bill the terms of which, in the bestowal of power, were so loose, unguarded, and dangerous as those of the bill now before the House, with its proposed amendments. Take for example, a part of section six. Read it:

The Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide or cause to be erected suitable buildings for asylums and schools; and the Commissioner may provide a common-school education for all refugees and freedmen who shall apply therefor.

The lands to be acquired may be anywhere in the United States, and there is no limit as to amount or cost or quality, except the discretion of the officers. Any freedman or refugee may apply for a common-school education, whether male or female, young or old, octogenarian or infant; and the Commissioner may provide it at the expense of the country. What is a "common-school education," and how long will it take some negroes to acquire it? What will it ultimately cost the people? But enough of this.

The whole system is wrong. The principle of the bill is wrong. The assumption that Congress may take such charge of any class of people is radically wrong. These negroes are free men. They can only become good citizens, capable of self-support and self-government, by the discipline of absolute self-dependence. They must be left substantially to work out their own destiny. You can never make them able to take care of themselves by this system of Government nursery. Give them full and ample protection for person and property, and they will do better than they can be made to do under this system. Their greatest amelioration must arise out of the feelings of sympathy and friendship between them and the whites. The great law of intelligent self-interest, if left free to work, without extraneous interference and irritations, must soon convince both races that they can best and most effectively serve themselves and develop their separate interests by serving each other and aiding each other in a spirit of mutual kindness. It will require and ultimately accomplish the highest development of the capacities of each race, and lead to more enduring happiness and prosperity than can otherwise be secured.

But the policy contemplated in this bill, by exciting false and delusive hopes in the minds of the negroes, will only lead to ever-increasing hostility between the races and frequent conflicts of authority in the States where they are, and will only put off any genuine and enduring improvement in the condition of the freedmen and prevent the early solution of the great problem of labor in the southern States, and thus retard the prosperity of the country and of both races.

Mr. HILL. I move to amend the pending motion to recommit the bill by adding to it instructions to the committee to amend the bill as follows:

Amend the first section by striking out of lines six and seven the following words, namely, "in all parts of the United States," and insert in lieu thereof the following, namely, "in all the States lately in rebellion, and also in the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri."

Amend the proviso in the fifth section by inserting in line ten, between the words "the" and "owner," the word "former."

Amend the proviso in the fifth section by inserting in line ten, between the words "the" and "owners," the word "former," and strike out all between the word "authorized," in line twelve, and "to," in line fourteen, of said section.

Mr. MARSHALL obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to offer a resolution for reference to a committee?

Mr. MARSHALL. Certainly.

STEAMBOAT PILOTS, AFRICAN TRADE, ETC.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire as follows, and report by bill or otherwise, namely:

1. Whether any legislation is necessary to prevent the combination of pilots of steamboats on the western waters.
2. Into the expediency of abolishing the offices of naval officers and surveyors.
3. Into the condition of the American trade on the coast of Africa, and what measures, if any, are necessary to extend and protect it.

Mr. MARSHALL resumed the floor, but yielded to

Mr. RITTER, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 3, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session, under order of the House, for the purpose only of debate upon the Freedmen's Bureau bill, as the special order. No business is in order, and no motion will be in order except a motion to adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. WILLIAM J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication; in which he had been directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Would it be proper, under the order of the House on yesterday, for me to move the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it be printed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks such a motion would not be in order, as it is in the nature of business.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, on which Mr. MARSHALL was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. As I am quite unwell this morning, I should not attempt to enter into any discussion of the important measure now before the House for its consideration if it were not for the fact that I deem it to be my duty as a member of the committee that reported this bill to the House, and as a Representative of a constituency interested in this proposed legislation, to express briefly the objections which I have to the passage of this bill. And as I have no prepared speech for the occasion, I do not propose to enter into a full or elaborate discussion of all the important questions which naturally and irresistibly present themselves to the mind in considering this bill. Its importance cannot well be magnified. It inaugurates a measure which must result in the expenditure of untold millions of money to be wrung from the toiling and already oppressed masses of the country. It involves principles, as I conceive, running antagonistic to the fundamental principles of the Government, and such being the case it is difficult to conceive of a measure involving more important consequences than the one now before the House.

The professed object of the bill—to look after and take care of that race of men who have recently, by the revolution that has swept over the country, been freed from the bonds of slavery, men who are houseless and homeless—may be considered in one point of view a very charitable and laudable purpose. If this Government has the power to enact such a bill as this; if we have the money which we can, without oppression of the people, appropriate to such purposes; and if we had no more laudable claims upon us that are pressing upon our attention at this time, then this measure might be deemed a laudable one. To look after the oppressed, to educate the ignorant, to raise up those who are bowed down by oppression, and place them upon vantage ground from which they can work out their own destinies, and achieve such position as they have the merit within them to attain, is unquestionably a laudable purpose. It is one of those purposes which might appeal strongly to the kind offices of the wealthy and benevolent of the country.

But I deny at the very outset that this Federal Government has any authority to become the common almoner of the charities of the people. I deny that there is any authority in the Federal Constitution to authorize us to put our hands into their pockets and take therefrom a part of their hard earnings in order to distribute them as charity. I deny that the Federal Government was established for any such purpose, or that there is any authority or warrant in the Constitution for the measures which are proposed in this most extraordinary bill.

I do not desire to dwell too long on these general objections. Every dollar that you take from the citizen without warrant of the Constitution is nothing more than robbery. Now, what does this bill propose to do? It proposes to establish by Federal power, to be supported by Federal bayonets in all the States of this Union, and in every county thereof, if the Secretary of War sees proper so to do, a separate and independent local jurisdiction and government for the purpose of governing, feeding, clothing, educating, and providing homes for the emancipated slaves, and of interfering with and controlling the local government and police of the people of those States; to establish an empire within an empire, providing one government for one race and another for another. I would like for some gentleman to explain to this House where this Congress gets authority for the passage of any such law.

It is a fundamental principle of American law that the regulation of the local police of all the domestic affairs of a State belongs to the State itself, and not to the Federal Government. This is a principle which has never been denied until recently. The Federal Government has never attempted to act upon any other principle until this system of measures was inaugurated. Whence comes the power to carry out such measures as this? If no such power is conferred upon the Government by the Federal Constitution, then the attempt to thrust your hands into the pockets of the people to raise money for this purpose, is, I repeat, nothing more than robbery, and it cannot properly be designated in any other way. I want some gentleman to tell me where is the authority to go into the States and establish a distinct local jurisdiction, separating as to governmental control two races of people, creating one species of government for one class of the population, while another class have another species of government.

I know that in these latter days it is deemed by many of those who are overburdened by superabundant and superlative "loyalty" somewhat treasonable to speak of the Constitution of our country. But, sir, I know of no loyalty except that which is due to the Constitution and laws. A few years ago that was the only test which any one thought of requiring. The only question was, is a man true to the Constitution and obedient to the laws? It is only one or two years ago that we were told that the President was the Government, and that every man was disloyal who did not approve every act of his, although those acts might be deemed usurpations. But we have now gone even further than that. It is now disloyal for a man to raise his voice in opposition to the decrees of a revolutionary cabal that has been organized here for the purpose of controlling the destinies of this country. Even the President of the United States himself is not now exempt from the charge of disloyalty. He is arraigned and the most blasphemous maledictions hurled against him for having expressed his opinions in friendly converse in regard to proposed amendments of the Constitution of our country, and he is charged with having been guilty of an act which in any other country would have cost him his head. There has been established here a despotism, a dictatorship, a tribunal as lawless and revolutionary in its purposes as the organization of the Jacobins in France, when they inaugurated the proceedings which brought the unfortunate Louis XVI to the block; and this revolutionary cabal of our day is, in my judgment, animated by similar passions and seeking similar objects.

A Representative from the great commercial metropolis of this country had the audacity to express on this floor a generous and liberal sentiment in regard to the brave, unfortunate, though erring, men on the other side of the Potomac who fell during the late terrible civil war, and whose bones are now bleaching on the soil of their desolated country; and for that simple expression of generous feeling he is to be denounced, crushed, immolated. Maledictions, such as were never heard in a deliberative body, are hurled against him; and an attempt is made to arouse the worst passions of the mob against him for the expression of his sentiments in this body where we are all peers and have equal rights under the Constitution and laws.

Now, sir, I believe the honorable chairman of the committee on freedmen, [Mr. ELIOT,] who has reported this bill to the House, and is responsible for its management, is now upon the floor; and I should like to know by what authority, by virtue of what clause of the Constitution, this bill is to be pressed upon the House and forced upon the country. Where is the authority? Does the gentleman, or any of the friends of this measure, insist that Congress has power to enact any law unless that power is given by the Constitution? Now, the power to regulate their own domestic institutions and their own local police is expressly reserved to the States. Sir, the Federal Government has never had any such power. So jealous, indeed, were the colonies of this right to regulate and control their internal police, that during the throes of their terrible conflict for independence they refused to surrender to the revolutionary Congress any such power. They did so when the Declaration of Independence was made. They did so when the Articles of Confederation were adopted, and they did so when the Government was formed under which we are now acting, and the Constitution which we are sworn to obey. These facts are trite, but seem to have been forgotten, and men seem to act in these times as if the Government had the power to pass any law whatever without regard to the limitations of the Constitution; to rob the people by unjust taxation; to take the hard earnings from the white people of the West, who, unless wiser counsels prevail, will themselves soon be reduced to worse than Egyptian bondage. I demand to be informed here upon this floor by what power you put your hands into their pockets and drag from them their money to carry out the purposes of this measure.

The convention of Maryland, on the 28th of June, 1776, before the Declaration of Independence was adopted, passed the following resolution:

"That the deputies of said colony, or any three or more of them, be authorized and empowered to concur with the other United Colonies, or a majority of them, in declaring the United Colonies free and independent States, in forming such further compact and confederation between them, in making foreign alliances, and in adopting such other measures as shall be adjudged necessary for securing the liberties of America, and that said colony will hold itself bound by the resolutions of the majority of the United Colonies in the premises: Provided, That the sole and exclusive right of regulating the internal government and police of that colony be reserved to the people thereof."

And this resolution was laid before the Continental Congress some days before the Declaration was adopted, as a limitation upon the powers of the delegates to bind the State of Maryland, and as an annunciation of the sense in which the people thereof accepted said Declaration.

Other colonies adopted similar resolutions. They were sent to the delegates and presented to the Continental Congress. It was understood at all times, and has been a part of the public law of this country, that the Continental Congress acquired no right even during the throes of the revolutionary struggle to interfere with the internal police of the people of the States.

And, sir, when the Articles of Confederation were formed it was provided in article two—

"That each State should retain its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which was not, by those Articles of Confederation, delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

And when the Federal Constitution was adopted, establishing the Government under which we now live, although by a fair construction of that instrument, any court would have held that the Federal Government thereby acquired no powers except such as were delegated to it by the Constitution itself, yet for fear of a latitudinarian construction an amendment was adopted declaring that—

"All the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

No man who has any regard for the principles of the Constitution will controvert this exposition of the powers of the Federal Government. And as we are sworn here in the first place to have regard in all our acts upon this floor to this great fundamental instrument, I again call upon the advocates of the bill to tell me where they find in this Constitution any authority to take uncounted millions of the people's money to feed, clothe, educate, and buy lands and houses for the emancipated negroes of the South; and where the power to usurp the local jurisdiction of the States; and I will cheerfully give way to any one who will undertake to furnish the information.

I know that some have pretended that Congress acquires the powers asserted in this bill by virtue of the second clause of the amendment to the Constitution recently adopted. That amendment is as follows:

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall be duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this provision by appropriate legislation."

Congress has power to enforce what? The abolition of slavery. This is not denied. Slavery is abolished throughout the entire land. If any man asserts the right to hold another in bondage as his slave, his chattel, and refuses to let him go free, Congress can by law, under this clause, provide by appropriate legislation for the punishment of the offender and the protection from slavery of the freedman. But Congress has acquired not a particle of additional power other than this by virtue of this amendment. Whether it was right or wrong to abolish slavery in the manner in which it was done, none deny that it is now abolished. Not one man in the whole land is attempting, by virtue of local law or otherwise to hold another man in bondage as his slave, in the sense in which this term is used in American law.

The power which one man claims to the service of another—the power to hold him in subjection to his will, and to sell him as property—that was slavery as understood at the time this section was ingrafted in the Constitution.

Now, sir, under this second section, unquestionably if there is any attempt to reduce these men again to this kind of slavery, if any master refuses to allow his former slave to go at large, to leave his plantation, his county, or State, to have perfect right of locomotion, then it is within the power of the Federal Government, under this clause, to interpose, and to provide by law for a punishment for such an attempt. But, sir, does that empower this Government to correct or interfere with legislation in regard to different classes in the same State, or different peoples in this Government? Unquestionably not. In California legislation discriminates against a class of Asiatics that have settled among them. In the State of Illinois we do not grant to the African race all the privileges and immunities which are granted to the white race. But, sir, is the black man in Illinois in consequence of that a slave? If unjust and unequal laws make all slaves who are injured thereby, then, sir, we of the West are all now reduced to slavery. Although we have the finest country on earth, our people are now borne down almost to the verge of poverty by a system of class legislation. The manufacturers and capitalists of the country, taking advantage of the power they have acquired in the national Legislature, have imposed a most unjust and outrageous tariff and financial system upon us by the combined effect of which the mass of the people in the West are now compelled to pay from two to four times as much for any article of merchandise they buy as they have ever been required to pay at any former time, and while this is so their grain is rotting in their granaries for want of markets. And yet you have sent your tax-gatherers to every man's homestead; they are in every county, North and South; they are diving into the cellars, scrambling into the garrets, and prying everywhere to find something on which to lay their inexorable grasp. Every article that the farmer buys is doubly taxed before it reaches him. A few years ago, during those Administrations which the saintly patriots on this floor are so eloquent in denouncing, the poor man of the West could with one dollar buy ten yards of the heaviest brown sheetings for his family. Now it takes five dollars to buy the same goods. And, sir, it is no exaggeration to say that of the larger part of this additional four dollars you are literally robbing him, by the jugglery of class legislation, enacted in part to add to the swollen hoards of the manufacturers of New England, and the bankers, speculators, and bond-holders of the country. The farmer is taxed on everything he eats, drinks, or wears, on all that he owns, all that he buys, and all that he sells; on the bed on which he lies down to die, and on the coffin in which he is buried. And even then he does not escape you, for before the clods are settled upon his grave your tax-gatherer lays his grasp upon the heritage he leaves to his children.

All this he might endure if the burdens you impose fell equally upon all classes. But, sir, while the western farmer is thus literally hunted down the wealthy bond-holder, who counts his income by the hundred thousand dollars, is by your legislation actually exempted from taxation, while the lordly manufacturer is protected—yes, that is the word—protected in the privilege of charging for his goods double what they could be bought for if free competition with the world were allowed by your laws. The increase in wealth of these favored classes is without a parallel. Their incomes are more than princely. They dazzle us with their lordly equipages as they dash by us. Their palatial residences, whose glittering domes almost kiss the heavens, rise as if by magic before our astonished gaze. And this political jugglery, this legislative system of robbery, has not only been permitted, but, sir, these laws have been enacted without so much as a protest from the Representatives of the West of the dominant party. These gentlemen have been so much occupied in glorifying and magnifying their own immaculate virtues and rampant patriotism that they have entirely forgotten the interests of their constituents. But, sir, the people of the West are beginning to understand this legislative hocus-pocus by which their money is conjured out of their pockets into the plathoric coffers of the money lords of the land; and a storm is now gathering that will hurl from their seats many over-righteous patriots, who are now so completely absorbed with the contemplation of their own exalted virtues that they do not even now suspect the danger.

If, then, unjust legislation makes slaves of those who are wronged thereby, we of the West are this day being subjected and reduced to worse than Egyptian bondage. But this is not the sense in which the word was used in the Constitution. It referred to slavery only as it was known in the southern States, the system by which one man held another as his property. That system of slavery is abolished, and the Federal Government has the right to see that men are not reduced to that system of slavery, and they have no power beyond that under that clause of the Constitution.

Now, to come down to some of the details of this bill. Section six gives the right to the Freedmen's Bureau to go into the States, ad libitum et ad infinitum, without any limit but their own discretion, and buy up the lands of the country. And for what? For the purpose of settling thereon the freedmen of the country, and protecting and maintaining them until they become, I suppose, a self-sustaining institution.

Again, I ask where they obtain the power to do that. I deny it, and the duty devolves upon those who claim that the power exists to show it. If any gentleman thinks there is any such power in the Constitution, let him name it now. I am ready to hear it. I deny that there is in the Federal Constitution any power given to Congress to authorize the Secretary of War, or any one else, in the name of the Government, to go into the States and buy up the lands of the country and sell them out again. Congress has power to dispose of the public lands, and it is only under that provision of the Constitution that the public domain is disposed of; but Congress has no power under the Constitution to buy up lands for the purpose of speculation, or for any charitable or other purpose whatever.

I shall confine my remarks mainly to the bill as it passed the Senate and is now before the House. I am aware that some amendments have been offered. Whether they shall be adopted or not, they do not in my judgment to any great extent remove the objections which I entertain to the bill now before the House. I wish to call the attention of the House first to the provisions of section seven. I will read it, that the points I intend to make may be better understood by those who favor me with their attention:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, custom, or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, including the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or wherein they or any of them are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties, for the commission of any act or offense, than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against.

Now, I contend that under the construction which may and probably will be put upon this section and the subsequent sections, this bill will establish military law in every State and in every county of the United States, and give the military arm of the Government power to go into Kentucky, into Tennessee, or into Illinois, and there establish military tribunals for the purpose of protecting the freedmen, and override the laws of the States.

Now, it so happens that in the State of Illinois, in Indiana, and in many others of the northern States, a discrimination in some respects is made against those of the African race, and I contend that wherever any such discrimination is made against them, under the provisions of this bill, it is within the power of the Federal Government to send its officers there and establish military tribunals within every State and district of the Union.

Mr. ELIOT. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] whether he would be understood as saying that in the State of Illinois the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion?

Mr. MARSHALL. This bill is to be construed by a class of men to whom I shall refer directly, and who I suppose may be called judges, who are created by this bill as officers, from whose decisions there is no appeal, and which the military is to be called upon to enforce. I intend briefly to show the reasons for my saying that under this bill you are establishing military tribunals in every county in the United States, in each State "where the course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion." Now, I say that in one sense the course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion in every State in the Union. During the rebellion, and as a result of it, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended, and martial law was declared as the law of the land over this entire Union. Men were arrested in disregard of the laws of the States, and the judges of the State of Illinois were prohibited from exercising their jurisdiction and duties in many respects, and one of them, Judge Constable, was imprisoned in consequence of the performance of his official duties. He was seized and dragged off to another State and there kept in custody, because he attempted to enforce the laws of the State of Illinois. Another eminent judge of my State was dragged away from his home and official duties and imprisoned for months within sight of this Capitol. Martial law prevailed as the law of the land, as the result of the rebellion, in every State of the Union, and the course of judicial proceedings was to that extent interrupted, as the result of the rebellion in every State. Whether that would be the construction that a Chief Justice Marshall or any other eminent jurist would place upon this provision, I cannot say. We are to consider whether those who are to enforce this law, and from whose decision, there is no appeal, will so construe it. They are to be the servants of the man who may be at the head of the War Department. And he is to send his military satraps into every county and district of these States. And they may enslave and put down the entire white people of the country by virtue of this law.

Mr. ELLIOT. If I understand the gentleman correctly he has taken the ground that in his judgment the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted in every State of the Union in consequence of the rebellion. If that is his view, then the course of his argument is legitimate. I take issue with him upon that view, and desire to say simply that this seventh section applies only to those States and districts wherein the ordinary course of judicial proceeding has been interrupted, and nowhere else.

Mr. MARSHALL. I admit that all I have said in regard to this turns on the construction to be given to this section of the bill. I have said that I do not know whether the construction I have suggested would be placed upon this provision by our most eminent jurists; but I do know that these men who are to be appointed, and who are to have the powers of judges, who are to be unsworn, so far as I know or can learn from the provisions of the bill, are to construe this act as they please, and their construction is to be maintained by the military arm of the Government.

Instead of this being called a bill for the protection of freedmen and refugees, it ought to be called a bill for the purpose of destroying the Constitution of the United States and subjecting the people thereof to military power and domination. That would be a much more appropriate title.

And what are these discriminations, which, if made, are to lead to the subversion of the laws of the States and to foisting military law upon the people of the country? I suppose that to testify in courts of justice is a civil right. Now, in Illinois until last winter that right was denied to the children of Ham. I suppose the right to sit upon juries is a civil right. Now, if on account of any local law or prejudice they are denied any civil rights accorded to white men, these military tribunals and these agents of the Government are to be foisted upon the country for the purpose of taking charge of and protecting these people. I suppose the right to marry a white woman is a civil right which belongs to the white men of Illinois; it is denied to the black man there. And if any judge undertakes to punish him for attempting to exercise that civil right, your military judges are to interfere, and without indictment or jury, to punish the judge by a fine of $1,000, and imprisonment for one year, and there is no appeal from their decision. This is so palpably in violation of article six of the amendments to the Constitution, which declares that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed," that it will not bear discussion or argument.

I suppose, sir, that to vote at elections is a civil right. We deny that right to the negro in Illinois. Now, I want to know whether you are going to pass through this House and force upon the country a bill under which, if the judges of elections in Illinois or any other State refuse, under the law of the State, to allow negroes to exercise the elective franchise, your little military judge, backed by military authority, can step in and arrest these judges of election, and imprison them twelve months and fine them each $1,000. Yet such is the construction of which this bill is susceptible; such is the construction which any man who may see proper to abuse power would willingly place upon it.

The gentleman will not deny that these rights to which I have referred are civil rights. No gentleman in the House will deny it. Yet, by the provisions of this bill, if, on account of any local law or local prejudice, any State should deny to the black man any civil right which is accorded to the white man, these military tribunals are to interpose and punish the judge or other officer of the law who shall attempt to enforce the local law.

Now, sir, let me comment a moment on the eighth section of this bill. It provides for the appointment of agents who may be sent into every county of the United States, or if the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana should be adopted, into every county of fifteen States of this Union. Over a thousand men at least are to be sent out under the direction of the Secretary of War as the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, who are to sit as judges and enforce this bill, if it should become a law, placing their own construction upon it; and from these decisions there is to be no appeal.

And who are to be these judges? I know not who they will be; but it seems to me, without intending to make any invidious remarks, that if you wish to oppress a people, if you wish to drive from their breasts every sentiment of loyalty, if you wish to perpetuate the spirit of disunion, if you wish to make a restoration of fraternity impossible, you could devise no better scheme for that purpose than that which is embodied in this bill, the operations of which must tend to revive the flames of civil war and involve us again in all the horrors of anarchy, misrule, and despotism.

Who are to be sent out as agents of this bureau? Will they be men selected on account of their judicial knowledge? Not at all. They will be the mere satraps or parasites of power, who will doubtless, many of them, go forth as spies. I know not whether they would be sent for that purpose; but the power at least is granted in the bill; and we ought to be careful in granting to any man on earth unlimited powers of this kind. Beyond a doubt, many of these agents will act as informers and libelers of the people among whom they will be sent. Many of them would doubtless be respectable men, while others might merely act as super-servicable creatures of some political schemer, whose purposes would be subserved by whatever libels and slanders might be collected by these agents.

But the jurisdiction conferred by this eighth section is not to be exercised except in States whose constitutional relations with the Government are suspended. How do I know that some revolutionary cabal may not insist at some time that the constitutional relations of Illinois with the Federal Government are suspended? Why are not the constitutional relations of all the States to the Government restored now? The flag of the Union is floating over every town and hamlet of the nation; the laws of the Federal Government are nowhere resisted; for nine months no man has been found in arms against the Government; your courts can conduct their proceedings without interruption in every county of every State, North and South; your tax-gatherers have already penetrated every part of the land and are collecting money for the support of the Government. Those States have their Governors, their Legislatures, their laws, in full operation. Why are not their constitutional relations to the Government restored? It is for the simple reason that a revolutionary cabal at the commencement of this Congress refused to allow them representation upon this floor. Will gentlemen deny if they were admitted, if their Representatives were here, that their constitutional relations would not be fully restored? Our revenues are collected there. Custom house officers are in every part of the South. The laws are nowhere resisted. If, by placing your doorkeepers at the doors of this Hall and shutting out their Representatives, you destroy their constitutional relations to the Federal Government, what, then, is to hinder the dictator of this House or this revolutionary cabal to refuse to admit the delegation from Illinois, to declare that their names shall be stricken from the rolls, and we to be told when we come here that we have no right to seats in this Hall? This is a new and very summary way to bring about disunion. If we were refused our seats upon this floor would you say that the constitutional relations of Illinois to the Government would be destroyed? And, so far as the enforcing the laws of the Government is concerned, this is the only difference between Tennessee and Illinois to-day.

I believe the man who is at the head of the Freedmen's Bureau is a good man, a gallant and excellent officer; but, sir, we should place in no man unlimited power. What is to be the amount of the expenditures under this law? It may be twenty million and it may be two hundred million. You may buy up lands without limit. You may purchase provision and grant transportation at pleasure.

Has it come to this in this free Government, that you shall place in the hands of any man, that you shall not how esteemed he may be, the power to squander the people's money at pleasure, to feed, support, and educate the negroes of the country?

If the power should unfortunately be placed in the hands of a man who would abuse it, we would see marched into the States, and especially into the southern States, parasites, who would know nothing but to do the bidding of their master. They will do everything to perpetuate strife and to prevent the restoration of fraternal feelings between all the sections of the country. There is not a man on the face of the earth into whose hands I would place such power. I do not know that these powers would be abused, but I would never place in the hands of any man unbridled, unlicensed power. It is almost impossible for any man to resist the temptation to abuse such authority.

Mr. Speaker, what time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have occupied a great deal more time than I expected when I began. My remarks, I know, have been very desultory. I have made these criticisms in good faith. I think there is no warrant in the Constitution for the enactment of any such law; and if there was any such power it would still be a great wrong to so use it. There are others who have higher claims to our consideration. In Tennessee and other southern States thousands of loyal men left their homes to battle for the flag of the Union; and in many cases their entire property was seized in their absence and appropriated to the use and support of the Federal armies, and their families reduced to poverty and want. These brave men, after their long services to the country, return to find their homes desolate, and their wives and children in poverty and rags. And they now come here to ask the Government to pay only for the property actually taken for the use of the Government. The claim of these men to such compensation is a just and holy one. This is not denied. But I do not hear of the enactment of a law to pay these claims. You have, on the contrary, passed a resolution that such claims shall not be considered, because, as you allege, the Government is not now able to pay these debts. No "loyal" voice is raised in these Halls to denounce the outrage. No peans are sung in praise of those wronged defenders of their country. They happen, unfortunately, to be white men and white soldiers, and they may starve and die from want, and no wail will be raised in their behalf; but when money is wanted to feed and educate the negro I do not hear any complaints of the hardness of the times or of the scarcity of money.

I, sir, am very far from wishing to oppress the negro. I have no objection to your giving him the benefit of a generous homestead law. Let him go, if you please, on to the public and unoccupied lands and obtain for himself a home. Give him ample time to pay therefor and acquire a perfect title. But I insist that you shall not for his sake heap further burdens upon the oppressed white men of your country.

But, sir, there is another, a higher and holier claim still upon the justice, not the charity, of the country; that of the white soldiers who fought the battles of the Republic. Especially is this so of those gallant men who in 1861 and 1862, when the dreadful storm of civil war raged in all its fury, did not stop to make terms with their imperiled country, but, snatching a hasty kiss from their wives and their little ones, rushed to the front of battle and held aloft the stars and stripes amid the iron hail that literally rained around them. During their absence your currency became inflated, the necessities of life rose to fabulous prices, and the pittance you gave them would not buy bread for their famishing babes. And, sir, but for the kind charities of neighbors and friends many of them would have perished miserably in starvation and beggary. Thousands of these brave men went to battle never to return. Their bones lie bleaching on the battle-fields made sacred by their martyrdom. The survivors, and the widows and orphans of those who have fallen, come here with their just petition to have a bounty paid them equal to that given to those who remained behind and made terms with the Government. I speak not for the three months' men, or the one years' men. I speak for those who then enlisted for three years and bore the heat and burden of the day. They do not ask for the extravagant local bounties paid to many who enlisted at a later day. They do not even ask for the largest bounties paid by the Government itself. But they do insist that you shall make up to them the $300 afterward paid to all who volunteered for the same period of time. Can there be any juster, higher, or holier claim than this?

Many of these gallant men have gone down to their graves, while others in ruined health have returned to homes, desolated by poverty. The enormous taxation oppresses those returned veterans or the bereaved families of those whose bones rest on the southern soil. No juster claim can be brought before Congress. But unfortunately they are white men, white soldiers of the Republic, and so the claim which they send up from their impoverished homes is not listened to. The aggregate amount of this claim has been scandalously magnified, but it is certain that it cannot exceed what in all probability will be the cost to the Government of the measure you are inaugurating by the passage of this bill. But this bounty claim is for the benefit of white soldiers, and their widows and orphan children, and their claims will not be heeded. No report is likely to be made in their favor, but we have been consuming two whole months in legislating for the negro. Now, sir, if either is to be postponed, I am decidedly in favor of postponing the negro and letting the white soldier, who fought so gallantly for his country, be paid what is so justly due him.

Sir, there are poor white men in our country who need the charity of the Government as much, at least, as colored men. Look around these galleries. Our constituents cannot spare time to come here day after day and listen to the discussions in these Halls, but from the commencement of this session until now you find your galleries crowded with the children of Ham, who are to be fattened out of the Treasury of the country. These are the people that come here day after day, and darken these legislative Halls, while my constituents are toiling at home unable to pay the tax-gatherer. For want of a market, their grain rots in the granary, while we have for our audience these lazy vagabonds, but in this dispensation highly favored citizens of African descent.

Sir, this measure that is proposed is an enormity that the people will not bear; and I warn my colleagues and Representatives from the West that when the people of that section understand that this whole Government is in the power and control to-day of the manufacturers of Pennsylvania and New England, and the capitalists of Wall Street, that it has been run for the last four years in their interest, that it is now being run in the same interest, and that the leading measures before this Congress are being put through in that interest, and in the interest of the negro, to the utter ruin of the laboring white men of the country, they will rise up in indignation and in such a way as to make themselves heard against this most outrageous legislation.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to speak on this subject until last evening, and therefore I shall occupy the time of the House but for a short period, when I shall yield the floor to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. Moulton.]

Perhaps, sir, it is impossible to frame a law upon a subject of such vast importance as is involved in this bill that at the outset will be satisfactory to all. Even the friends of the bill who are not of the committee, and who have not found time to study it, may think they see some faults in it, while it is to be expected that our friends on the other side, who are opposed to all legislation on the subject, will be very sharp in their criticisms. I consider the bill as perfect as we can get it. It will be at all times under the control of Congress, subject to amendment or repeal. The great events which have just now transpired, and which have in so high a degree changed the condition of public affairs, require in my judgment the adoption of the provisions of this bill, at least for a temporary period. It does not abridge the right of any one.

Some of our friends on the other side used to declare that if we gave freedom to the slaves all at once, even in one year, they would perish from off the face of the earth. The gentlemen did not seem to understand, or they were unwilling to acknowledge, that the highest interest of the Republic for all time to come required emancipation, although thousands upon thousands should perish in consequence thereof.

The object of the Freedmen's Bureau is employment to the emancipated with compensation secured for their labor. This is one of the leading features of the bill, to give employment to these unfortunate men who are now wandering over the country homeless and friendless, so that the prophecy that they would all perish under immediate emancipation shall not come to pass.

Another object is to give them an opportunity to learn to read and to protect them reasonably in their civil rights. They ought not to be left to perish by the wayside in poverty and by starvation when the country so much needs their work. It is not their crime nor their fault that they are so miserable. From the beginning to the present time they have been robbed of their wages, to say nothing of the scourgings they have received. I think that the nation will be a great gainer by encouraging the policy of the Freedmen's Bureau, in the cultivation of its wild lands, in the increased wealth which industry brings, and in the restoration of law and order in the insurgent States.

The gentleman from Illinois some twenty times in the course of his eloquent speech this morning called upon some one to tell him where Congress gets the power to enact such a law as this. I will endeavor to answer him in my poor way. And, in the first place, I commend to him to read the second section of the article of the immortal amendment of the Constitution giving to Congress power to pass all appropriate laws and make all appropriate legislation for the purpose of carrying out its provisions. I commend to his careful study the spirit of the second section of that immortal amendment, and I think if he will study it with a willingness to be convinced he will see that it has given to this Congress full power in the premises. Moreover, sir, I read in the Constitution that Congress has been at all times charged with the duty of providing for the public welfare, and if Congress shall deem that the public welfare requires this enactment, it is the sworn duty of every member to give the bill his support.

Sir, there is an old maxim of law in which I have very considerable faith, that regard must be had to the public welfare; and this maxim is said to be the highest law. It is the law of the Constitution, and in the light of that Constitution as amended I find ample power for the enactment of this law. It is the duty of Congress to exercise its power in such a time as this, in a time of public peril, and I hope that nobody upon this side of the House will be so craven as to want courage to come up to the question and give his vote for the bill. It is necessary to provide for the public welfare.

Mr. Speaker, I feel proud of my country when I behold it stretching out its strong arm of power to protect the poor, the ignorant, the weak, and the oppressed. I see in it the prosecution of a righteous purpose which cannot fail to secure the favor of Heaven. I see in it that which will bring my country a richer revenue of honor than all the eloquence of her forums or the glory of her battle-fields. I see in it infallible evidence that the nation is fast becoming what it was intended to be by the fathers—the home of liberty and an asylum for the oppressed of all the races and nations of men.

The words caste, race, color, ever unknown to the Constitution, notwithstanding the immortal amendment giving freedom to all, are still potent for evil on the lips of men whose minds are swayed by prejudice or blinded by passion, and the freedmen need the protection of this bill.

The era is dawning when it will be a reproach to talk in scorn about the distinctions of race or color. Our country is, and must be, cosmopolitan. The fathers invited the oppressed of all nations to come here and find a happy home. Many of them, from many nations, have come, and more are coming. They have come from the continents, and from all the isles of the sea. Jew and Gentile, Christian and Pagan, are here. Africa; once the home of Hannibal, poor, benighted Africa, so long groaning in bondage, so long peering with dim eye into the darkness in search of the light of the one true God, came with a clanking chain! But, by the aid of a strong Arm from on high, we have been able to set her children free; and they are now American citizens, all. We have among us men of all nations, of all kindreds and tongues. They all meet here to worship at freedom's shrine, and the Constitution intends they shall all be made politically free and equal.

It is in vain that we talk about race, caste, or color; in vain that we proudly talk about the Puritan, with his stubborn courage, his love of God, and his fidelity to man; in vain that we boast of the Cavalier, whose motto was—

"He either fears too much,
Or is deserving small,
Who dares not put it to the touch,
To win or lose it all!"

in vain to boast of the Anglo-Saxon stream, when a thousand rivers, from a thousand sources, are running into it ever. I repeat the sublime declaration that "all men are born free and equal."

This was a proclamation of political freedom and equality to all the races of men. The sooner the South gives heed to it the sooner she will be reconstructed. The sooner the North and South both give heed to it the better for all. It bears the seal of inevitable destiny, and whoever fights against it fights against God, and strikes in vain. Our Republic is yet in its young years, but the divine principles implanted in its bosom will not cease to animate it till all the men of all the races and bloods in our wide domain become politically free and equal. Whenever this desirable attainment shall be achieved and realized, the sword may be beaten into plowshares, and the spear into pruning-hooks.

This bill is as perfect as we can get it. It is intended to cast the shield of protection over four million American citizens, including old men, young men, and women and children. They are loyal and faithful, every one. Their young men have searched the battle-field for our wounded soldiers, and nursed them, when dying, into life; while their old men and women and children have prayed to God for the success of the nation's banner. They need schools and protection. They are not permitted to sue in the courts or testify against a white man. We owe them protection in return for their faithful allegiance, and I hope the bill will receive the undivided support of this side of the House.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON.]

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit some thoughts in connection with the bill now under consideration, and in doing so I desire, as far as my time will allow, to answer some of the objections that have been urged, especially by my distinguished colleague from the eleventh district of Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.] It will be impossible for me, in the short time allowed to me, to enter as fully into the consideration of this question as I should desire.

I will, therefore, proceed at once to submit as briefly as I can some reasons why I shall vote for this bill. What is the object of this bill? As I understand it, it is to protect four million people who have so long been denied civil rights in the southern States, and who are now dependent to a greater or less extent for the enjoyment of whatever rights they have upon protection from our Government. This state of things is one of the consequences of the war. These men have been thrown upon our hands in a helpless condition; they are unable to defend themselves, and are in the midst of a population whose prejudices have ever been against them.

Now, in regard to the first of the objections made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] as well as by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] on yesterday, which is that this bill is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, that we have no authority whatever to pass any such bill as this, permit me to say that this is the very argument that we have heard from the other side of this Chamber for the last five years with reference to every single measure that has been proposed to this House for the prosecution of the war for the Union. No measure has been passed for the benefit of the country, for the prosecution of this war, for the defense of your rights and mine, but has been assailed by gentlemen on the opposite side of this House with the argument that the whole thing was unconstitutional. This objection has been set forth in very elaborate, distinct, and set phrase in the platform they adopted at Chicago. It was the gravamen of the charge they made against the Administration, that its acts were unconstitutional and void, and were usurpations.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] asks us on this side of the House to inform him where we get the power to pass this bill for the protection of this class of people in the South. I will recite some of the provisions of the Constitution in which I believe ample and sufficient constitutional authority can be found for every word and every letter in this bill. The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to declare war and make rules and regulations concerning captures on land or upon water; that Congress shall have power to raise and support armies; that Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces of the United States; that Congress shall have power to provide for calling out the militia to execute the laws, to suppress insurrection, to secure tranquility, and to repel invasion; that Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers. And it is also made the duty of Congress to guaranty to each State a republican form of government, and to provide for the common good and for the general welfare. The Constitution also provides that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the immunities and privileges of the citizens of the respective States. And last, though not least, the constitutional amendment which has just been ratified for the abolition of slavery provides that Congress shall by proper legislation carry into execution the provisions of that amendment.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is where I find ample and sufficient power for the enactment of every provision of this bill. This bureau is completely and entirely a military establishment. It is not dependent at all upon the civil authority of this Government. It proceeds upon the assumption that it emanates from the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief, and it is to be executed through the military department of this Government.

Now, I understand that in time of war whatever is necessary for the purpose of carrying on the war and bringing it to a triumphant conclusion, provided it be in accordance with the laws of nations, is within the authority of the conquering Power. This Government is now acting upon the assumption that war exists to-day in all the rebel States. The Government has proceeded upon that policy up to the present moment. Military orders are being issued every day for the regulation and government of affairs in those States.

Why, sir, General Grant a few days ago, perhaps the 14th or 15th of last month, issued an order embracing substantially the provisions of this bill, and applying them to all the southern States. That order provided that wherever any discrimination had in any of those rebel States been made in regard to the freedmen or the refugees or the loyal people, these should be completely and perfectly protected against the enforcement of all orders or statutes emanating from State or local authority. I would like to ask the gentlemen on that side whether they consider that order constitutional or not; for I understand they intend to run General Grant as their candidate for President in 1868. General Grant's order is in these words:

[General Orders, No. 3.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 12, 1866.

To protect persons against improper civil suits and penalties in late rebellious States.

Military division and department commanders, whose commands embrace or are composed of any of the late rebellious States, and who have not already done so, will at once issue and enforce orders protecting from prosecution or suits in the State, or municipal courts of such State, all officers and soldiers of the armies of the United States, and all persons thereto attached, or in anywise thereto belonging, subject to military authority, charged with offenses for acts done in their military capacity, or pursuant to orders from proper military authority; and to protect from suit or prosecution all loyal citizens, or persons charged with offenses done against the rebel forces, directly or indirectly, during the existence of the rebellion; and all persons, their agents and employes, charged with the occupancy of abandoned lands or plantations, or the possession or custody of any kind of property whatever, who occupied, used, possessed, or controlled the same pursuant to the order of the President, or any of the civil or military departments of the Government, and to protect them from any penalties or damages that may have been or may be pronounced or adjudged in said courts in any of such cases; and also protecting colored persons from prosecutions in any of said States charged with offenses for which white persons are not prosecuted or punished in the same manner and degree.

By command of Lieutenant General Grant:
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Sir, I repeat, we have proceeded up to the present moment upon the assumption that war still exists. Military officers all through the southern States have issued orders nullifying completely the statutes of those States.

Mr. THORNTON. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MOULTON. I will.

Mr. THORNTON. I do not like to take up the gentleman's time; but as I desire to understand his position, I wish to ask him whether he assumes that the war is not over?

Mr. MOULTON. I do.

Mr. THORNTON. Then I would call the gentleman's attention for a single moment to the following letter of General Grant to the President of the United States:

"There is such universal acquiescence in the authority of the General Government throughout the portions of country visited by me that the mere presence of a military force, without regard to numbers, is sufficient to maintain order. The good of the country and economy require that the force kept in the interior, where there are many freedmen, (elsewhere in the southern States than at forts upon the sea-coast no force is necessary) should all be white troops."

Mr. MOULTON. That letter of General Grant does not militate at all against the position which I assume. Allow me to remark, sir, that General Grant was in the southern States for only a very few days, and had but little opportunity to ascertain the feeling of the people there. But, sir, the highest law officer of this Government has declared in an official communication which has been transmitted to Congress, that the war is not yet ended, and that war exists in the southern States. In addition to that, the order of General Grant, to which I have already referred, the order recently issued by General Terry in Virginia nullifying the action of the Legislature of that State, and other orders of a similar nature, issued with the sanction of the President of the United States, are all acts of war in contemplation of law. Of the same nature is the act of the President in the appointment of provisional governors.

Here is where I find the authority for the establishment of this bureau. It is a military establishment; and it is absolutely necessary for the protection of the freedmen and refugees in the South.

But, sir, let me state another reason why I am in favor of this bill. My friends upon the opposite side have protested all along against emancipation, on the ground that the negroes would flock into the free States, and that we would be overrun with that class of population. I repeat, sir, if they are sincere in their desire to keep the negroes from the free States they ought to join me and the Republicans on this side of the House in passing this bill. Why? The very object of this bill is to protect the freedmen and refugees in their rights; and let me say, whenever the colored man is completely and fully protected in the southern States he will never visit Illinois, and he will never visit Indiana, and every northern State will be depopulated of colored people, as will be Canada. I say that one of the objects of the bill is to protect these men in their civil rights against the damnable violence of the leading men in the southern States. That is one of the objects of the bill.

There is another reason why I understand gentlemen on the other side oppose this bill. The object of the bill is to protect the colored man. The pro-slavery party on the other side of the House from the foundation of the Government up to the present time have done everything they could against ameliorating the condition of the colored men. No act was ever passed or proposed to be passed for the benefit of the colored man that the Democratic party, the pro-slavery party, did not vote against it. It would have been inconsistent if they had not opposed this bill. One object of the bill is to ameliorate the condition of the colored man and to protect him against the rapacity and violence of his southern persecutors.

Let me notice the argument of my colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL.] I think I have fully answered the objection that it has no foundation in the Constitution. Let me say that I think the provisions of this bill are in accordance with the acts of the Government in reference to similar subjects. Our Government has continually appropriated money for persons similarly situated to these freedmen. Africans brought to our coast in contravention of our treaties in reference to the slave trade have been taken charge of by the Government, and sent back to their own homes, and money has been appropriated by which they have been provided for for years. Where did you get the authority to do that? I may allude to the same practice in regard to the Indian tribes. Only a few days ago a bill was introduced into this House by which we appropriated half a million of money for some half-starved Indians. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] said they were in a starving condition, and that unless we made the appropriation they would commit depredations upon the white people. We appropriated the money. It was in accordance with the practice of the Government, which has its foundation in the Constitution.

The gentleman has made another objection to this bill; and let me say that all the objections he has urged against this bill, when examined critically, have no foundation in the bill itself, but only in the imagination of my distinguished colleague.

He says this bill provides one law for one class of men, and another law for another class. The very object of the bill is to break down the discrimination between whites and blacks. The object of the bill is to provide where the refugees and freedmen are discriminated against, where a State says, as many do in the South, that the black man shall not make contracts, that the black man shall not enjoy the fruits of his labor, that he shall be declared a vagabond, a vagrant, and the same laws do not operate against the white men—that such discrimination shall not exist, notwithstanding the statutes of any State. Therefore I repeat that the true object of this bill is the amelioration of the condition of the colored people.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to make a suggestion at this point. I will not detain the gentleman a moment.

Mr. Speaker, just at this point I desire to say that a distinguished general, a citizen of Alabama, who recruited his regiment of loyal Alabamians, served with them with distinction in the war, marched with Sherman during the whole of his grand march, waited upon me last evening, and gave me, among other things, an Alabama newspaper, which I regret I have not brought to the House this morning, showing the execution of one woman and five men for larceny, under a sentence of the court; one woman and one man for stealing a horse, and one man for stealing a watch.

A MEMBER. Hung?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir, hung. One man was sentenced to ninety-nine years' imprisonment, if my memory serves me, for attempting to steal a horse.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Was that under the decision of a court and jury, or of a mob?

Mr. KELLEY. It was in the regular court proceedings in a leading journal of the State of Alabama, and was indorsed by the editor in an article announcing that the negroes must be kept away from the cities and towns, and that the plantation was the place for them. It had the elaborate indorsement of the editor.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KELLEY. With the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON.]

Mr. SMITH. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he has never read in the newspapers of white men in South Carolina and the South having been hung for stealing horses?

Mr. KELLEY. I was coming to the matter implied by the question of my distinguished friend from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH. All I wish is, that there shall be equal justice done to the people of the South as to representations on this floor.

Mr. KELLEY. And for that purpose I desire the passage of the Freedmen's Bureau bill. For I turned to the distinguished gentleman who brought me the account of that last outrage, and to the other citizens of Alabama who were with him, and I said, "Is this the punishment you mete out to white men in your State for such offenses?" And they answered unanimously, "No."

Several MEMBERS. Who was it?

Mr. KELLEY. It was General Spencer, of Alabama, the colonel of the first regiment of loyal Alabamians. He is not a man who conceals his name.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I wish to say that he may be a distinguished man, but it is the first time I ever heard of him.

Mr. KELLEY. That is quite possible. He may be a distinguished general; for all the intelligence of the country does not reach the central part of Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I wish to say that I had command of northern Alabama and middle Tennessee for nearly two years, and I believe I know every loyal and disloyal man of prominence in that country. I will not say that Colonel Spencer may not have been there, and I deny, in common with the whole army of that country, that he is a distinguished general or a distinguished anything else.

Mr. KELLEY. I would take the word of old Tecumseh Sherman against that of my distinguished military friend, much as I value him. I know that General Spencer served with mark under General Sherman, and I think at one time upon his staff.

I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that they hang black men and women for larceny in Alabama, and that they sentence them to ninety-nine years' imprisonment, and there is no such punishment meted out to the white rebel who steals a black man's horse.

Mr. MOULTON. I want to call attention as briefly as I can to other objections to this bill by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.] His principal objections to this bill were that the Government proposes to put its hand into the pockets of his constituents for the means of supporting colored people, refugees, negro schools, &c. Now, permit me to say that this argument addressed to the pocket has always been the argument in the mouths of demagogues everywhere and on all occasions. We have heard it in this Hall. Whenever the gentleman desires to make a speech for consumption at home he always appeals to the pockets of his constituents rather than to their common sense and reason.

Now, sir, permit me to inform that gentleman that the Freedmen's Bureau has been in operation for about nine months, and not a single dollar has ever been appropriated from the Treasury for the support of this bureau.

And let me tell another fact: that more than four million dollars are now placed to the credit of this bureau, not from the Treasury, to be expended under the officers and commissioners that may be appointed by this bill. So much for the expense.

But admitting that appropriations are to be made, I say that a solemn duty devolves upon this Congress to make that appropriation and to see that it is applied in accordance with the provisions of this bill.

The gentleman says there is no limitation to the expenditures. That is all true. But I will assume that Andrew Johnson, their candidate, the man to whom they look for their position hereafter, is honest; and if so, that he will appoint honest men who will discharge their duty in accordance with the provisions of this bill and under the regulations of the War Department.

My friend further says that this bill is an infringement of the local laws and usages of the States into which it goes. Permit me to say that this bill does not operate in that way at all. It only proposes that where the black man is unjustly discriminated against, or where any attempt is made to enforce unjust and unequal local civil laws against him, the military commission appointed by this bill shall interfere in his behalf.

My colleague says that it is a civil right to sit on juries, and that it is a civil right for a black man to marry a white woman. Now, I deny that it is a civil right for anybody to sit on a jury; I deny that it is a civil right for a white man to marry a black woman or for a black man to marry a white woman. It is a simple matter of taste, of contract, of arrangement between the parties. No man has a right to marry any particular woman, black or white. It is a matter of mutual taste, contract, and understanding between the parties. Besides, there is no deprivation of that right. The law, as I understand it, in all the States, applies equally to the white man and the black man, and there being no distinction, it will not operate injuriously against either the white or the black.

So far as the matter of sitting on juries is concerned, it is not a civil right, and why? Because you cannot enforce it by a civil writ. I understand that the civil rights referred to in the bill are not of the fanciful character referred to by the gentleman, but the great fundamental rights that are secured by the Constitution of the United States, and that are defined in the Declaration of Independence, the right to personal liberty, the right to hold and enjoy property, to transmit property, and to make contracts. These are the great civil rights that belong to us all, and are sought to be protected by this bill.

Mr. THORNTON. On the point upon which my colleague is now speaking, civil rights, I would ask him if a marriage between a white man and a white woman is a civil right?

Mr. MOULTON. It is not a civil right.

Mr. THORNTON. It is not?

Mr. MOULTON. No, sir, not in my opinion.

Mr. THORNTON. Then what sort of a right is it?

Mr. MOULTON. Marriage is a contract between individuals competent to contract it.

Mr. THORNTON. Is it a political or a civil right?

Mr. MOULTON. It is a social right. I understand that a civil right is a right that a party is entitled to and that he can enforce by operation of law.

Mr. THORNTON. I would ask my colleague if marriages are not contracted in all the States of this Union by virtue of provisions of law?

Mr. MOULTON. I think, perhaps, they are to a greater or less extent.

Mr. THORNTON. Then is not a contract provided for by law a civil right?

Mr. MOULTON. It is not especially provided for by the law regulating it. The right to marry is a right which cannot be enforced. There are a great many things a man can do that are imperfect obligations which cannot be enforced by law, and hence are not civil rights contemplated by this bill.

Mr. THORNTON. I call my colleague's attention to section seven, upon which he is now commenting, which provides that—

Whenever in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, custom, or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, including the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, &c.

Now, I insist that by fair, legitimate construction under that section, if the civil right of marriage was denied to a black man with a white woman, it would make the white man who denied it amenable to the penalty of $1,000 fine and one year's imprisonment under this law. I call his attention to it, and I ask him to reply to it.

Mr. COOK. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. THORNTON] whether he thinks that a white man has the right by law now to marry a black woman, and if that is the civil right of the white man?

Mr. THORNTON. That depends on the law. In the State of Illinois, as my colleague knows very well, it is against the law. It depends on the state of the law everywhere whether the thing can be done of which he inquires. If the law were against it, of course a black man could not marry a white woman. If the law allowed it, as it does allow it in the case of a white man and a white woman, it would be legal.

Mr. COOK. Is it as competent to prevent, by provision of law, a black woman from marrying a white man, as it is to prevent a white man from marrying a black woman?

Mr. THORNTON. I suppose it is.

Mr. MOULTON. The remarks that I made in connection with this matter were made for this purpose: I say that the right to marry is not strictly a right at all, because it rests in contract alone between the individuals, and no other person has a right to contract it. It is not a right in any legal or technical sense at all. No one man has any right to marry any woman he pleases. If there was a law making that a civil right, then it might be termed a civil right in the sense in which it is used here. But there being no law in any State to that effect, I insist that marriage is not a civil right, as contemplated by the provisions of this bill.

Now, let me call the attention of this House to one or two other remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.] He alludes to the condition of the negro in the State of Illinois, and says that this bureau might operate there. In my humble judgment, it would be impossible for this bureau to operate there, for these reasons: in the first place, the ordinary course of judicial proceedings have never been interrupted in our State; and in the second place, there is now no law upon our statute-book discriminating between the whites and the blacks other than the constitutional provision regulating suffrage. At the last session of our Legislature they swept from our statute-books all those odious black laws making discrimination between the whites and the blacks, so that to-day in the State of Illinois a black man can now give testimony in our courts; a black man can make contracts; a black man can purchase property, and hold it and transmit it as he pleases. He can come into and go out of the State at pleasure. Such is the condition of the law in the State of Illinois to-day, and therefore it is not possible this bureau could operate in Illinois.

But the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] says this bill makes the bureau perpetual. He says that it may last always, and that there is no knowing how long it will continue or who may be appointed. Permit me to say that any State in this Union can terminate the operation of the law within its own limits whenever it chooses to do so; it is entirely within its own power to do so. Let me refer to the eighth section of this bill to show that fact. It contains, among other provisions, the following:

The jurisdiction conferred by this and the preceding section on the officers and agents of his bureau shall cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the States and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice.

This bill, then, expressly provides for the cessation of this bureau in any State. It puts it in the power of any State in this Union to exclude it from its limits by ceasing to make unnatural discriminations between their own citizens. It seems to me that there is no objection upon that score.

Another objection is urged, that this bill gives the Government power to go into any of these States and appropriate public lands and distribute them among the freedmen and among the refugees. Is not that the constitutional power of the Government now? It is a power that has been exercised by this Government from its very foundation—the providing homesteads for the indigent and the poor of our country. It has always been exercised by the Government. And I am in favor of this bill, because it seeks to appropriate, in the first place, the public lands, and then to acquire lands by purchase in any one of these States from any one who desires to sell, in case the Government wants it. That is all there is about it.

Now, sir, my distinguished colleague [Mr. MARSHALL] assumed, as I understood, that there is no difference between the State of Tennessee and the State of Illinois with reference to their right of representation upon this floor, except that the Doorkeeper excludes those who claim seats as Representatives from Tennessee, while the Representatives from Illinois are admitted; and I understood him by inference to affirm that the other southern States are as much entitled to representation on this floor as Illinois or any other State. Did I understand my friend correctly?

Mr. MARSHALL. I was speaking in reference to the restoration of the southern States to their constitutional relations to the Union. In order that I may give my colleague an intelligent answer, I would ask him this question: if the Senate and House of Representatives should admit Senators and Representatives from the southern States, would not the constitutional relations of those States to the Union be restored?

Mr. MOULTON. I think they would.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, sir, I said that it was within the power of the majority here to direct the Clerk to exclude from this Hall all the members from Illinois; and as Tennessee now has a loyal Governor and is obeying the laws of the United States—as the courts are now being held there—I said that the exclusion of Tennessee from representation in this Congress is all the difference now existing, so far as I can see, between the State of Tennessee and the State of Illinois; and I think that this House has the same power to exclude by brute force the members from Illinois that it has to exclude the Representatives from Tennessee.

Mr. MOULTON. I ask my colleague to answer the question which I put to him, whether, in his opinion, the State of Tennessee, or Alabama, or Mississippi, or any one of those southern States, is entitled of right to representation upon this floor?

Mr. MARSHALL. When they send here loyal Representatives who can take the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the laws, those Representatives, I think, are entitled to be sworn in and to take their seats as Representatives of their constituencies.

Mr. MOULTON. I would ask my colleague whether he is in favor of enforcing or repealing the test oath.

Mr. MARSHALL. That is a new question entirely. If the gentleman will give me time to explain my views on that subject I will do so.

Mr. MOULTON. Cannot the gentleman answer yes or no? I am aware that it is a hard question, and I will not embarrass him by pressing it, if he prefers not to answer.

Mr. MARSHALL. I feel no embarrassment whatever on the question. I state to my colleague that if he will give me time to express my views in regard to that test oath, I will do so at this time.

Mr. MOULTON. I understand that my colleague declines to answer the question.

Mr. MARSHALL. No, sir; I do not decline; I do not do anything of the kind.

Mr. MOULTON. I have no objection to allowing the gentleman all the time he may desire, if it is understood that it is not to come out of my time.

Several MEMBERS. Oh no; go on.

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say with reference to those States; that the difference between the gentlemen on the other side and us on this question is that they are willing that whoever come up here as Representatives, and can take that oath, shall be admitted as members of this House, while we upon this side are not satisfied with that, but desire to know the sentiment, the spirit, the feeling of the men who elect them. Take Tennessee, for example. What is the condition in Tennessee to-day. It is true that high-minded, loyal, patriotic men, whom I respect as much as anybody, are here to-day seeking to represent Tennessee. But what is the testimony from Tennessee to-day? Why it is this: it is true, by the aid of Federal bayonets most of these men were elected. The rebels were deterred from the ballot-box. But when you withdraw the Federal power from the State of Tennessee there will be two rebels to one loyal man; and the next delegation sent up here will be as different from the honorable men here to-day as the sun is from darkness. Where then will be the State of Tennessee?

The position of the Union party on this side of the House is that we must be satisfied there is a majority of loyal constituency behind that can control the State in favor of the Government, and in favor of the flag, who will stand by the Government and support it in good faith and spirit in all of its constitutional acts.

The gentleman says this is a reiteration of the negro question. Permit me to say to the gentlemen on the other side, so long as this present unnatural condition of things remains, so long as four million men in the southern States are deprived of all their civil rights, so long as that condition exists, there will be agitation to all eternity. Permit me to say, this agitation will continue, and that I am in favor of continuing this agitation until every man shall be protected in all his civil rights under the laws. That is the kind of agitation I am in favor of; and permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this sentiment is held by the great mass of the people; not only in my State, but throughout the Northwest.

I repeat, that such an unnatural condition of things cannot exist in any free Government, such as four million men being crowded out, deprived of their rights, and with no security against the rapacity and violence of their persecutors. No republican institutions can exist or ever did exist under such circumstances. I repeat again, sir, that the continuance of this bureau depends entirely upon the people of the southern States themselves; that they can remove it sooner, but that it may be continued and ought to be continued for the purpose of the protection of this helpless class of people.

So far as the expenses connected with this bureau are concerned, of course appropriations will have to be made. It grows out of the necessity of the thing itself. We cannot help it. Let me put the proposition, and let gentlemen answer it if they can. Suppose the Federal power was removed from the southern States to-day; suppose the Army was removed; suppose there was no Freedmen's Bureau for the purpose of protecting freedmen and white refugees there, what would be the consequences? Why, sir, the entire body of freedmen would be annihilated, enslaved, or expatriated. No Union man would have any rights there at all. The testimony which will be published that has been exhibited before the committee of fifteen will astonish the world as to the hypocrisy of southern leaders and the condition of things in the South.

Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a moment longer. It has been urged here, and it is the great objection which seems to have been urged against this bill, that it takes the property of one man and gives it to another. Permit me to say there is no provision in this bill which authorizes any such thing. The Opposition say that by the order of the Government permission is given to refugees and freedmen to locate on certain lands in the South. That is true. They are now located on certain lands in the South. They were located there by the order of General Sherman more than a year ago, when he stood there as the conqueror of that country. Every one admits that at the time the order was made it was legal, it was constitutional, and it was strictly in accordance with the laws of war. I would like to have my friends on the other side answer whether it was or was not in accordance with the laws of war when the order was made. If the order was constitutional when it was made as an act of war for the purpose of protecting those freedmen and refugees, and as the Departments of the Government still decide the war has not ended, what is the reason why we shall not continue the operation of this order until the war entirely ceases? I should like to have the honorable gentleman on the opposite side answer that question.

It is not taking the property of one man to give it to another. It is the direct act of the conqueror sanctioned by war, and that war is not yet ended. We are occupying those lands which ought to be confiscated as the property of the public enemy.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the substance of the objections urged against this bill. It seems to me that they have been sufficiently answered. They do not militate against the main provisions of the bill, and we ought to pass it. We are in duty bound to pass it, and we will be derelict to our duty if we do not. The people everywhere demand its passage.

LIGHTING THE DOME OF THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. GRINNELL in the chair,) by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS, CAPITOL OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 3, 1866.

DEAR SIR: The dome will be lighted by Gardiner's electric apparatus at precisely seven o'clock this evening.

I think, if the members could be notified of the fact, that many of them would be glad to be present with their ladies.

The manner of lighting is a great triumph of art, and the picture in the dome appears much better by gas-light than by daylight.

If you think proper, please cause the members to be informed.

Yours, very truly,
B. B. FRENCH,
Commissioner Public Buildings.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives, United States.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—AGAIN.

Mr. RITTER obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the indulgence of my colleague to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. GRINNELL in the chair.) It is not in order.

Mr. SMITH. May I have it read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If it is in the nature of an argument it may be read.

Mr. SMITH. Can I have it read for the purpose of offering it on Monday?

Mr. RITTER. I yield for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. BANKS. If it is a proposition that leads to action either now or on Monday it cannot be read.

Mr. SMITH. My colleague agrees that it may be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If it is part of the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky it may be read.

Mr. RITTER. I decline to have it read as a part of my speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RITTER] will proceed.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, it may be truly said that the people of the United States are indeed a progressive people. We have made most rapid progress during the last five years in destroying property and in taking the lives of human beings and in increasing our national debt, and still we are not contented; bills are being presented to this House almost daily making additional demands for increased expenditures by increasing and enlarging the machinery of our Government, so that new offices are being multiplied to an enormous extent.

Indeed, sir, we have already gone so far in that direction that when we see such bills as the one now before this House, to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, with all that it requires, we may well begin to fear that we have not only destroyed vast amounts of property and of human life, but that we will very soon destroy that also which should be most dear to every American citizen, the credit of this nation. Sir, the powers of that bureau, which this bill proposes to enlarge, are already larger than anything of its kind that the world ever knew. No history, Mr. Speaker, with which I am acquainted gives any account of anything similar to this bureau. It is, sir, if I understand it, an illegitimate sprout of the Federal Government; it is, in other words, a government within a Government; it is not made for all the people, but for a part of the people only; it is not made for the white people of these United States, but for the colored people; but the enormous and vast amount of money required to sustain it, all or nearly all has to be paid by the white people.

Mr. Speaker, why is it necessary to continue this most powerful and expensive establishment? What is it that makes it right and proper for us to force upon the hard-working and honest people of the United States an annual tax of from twelve million dollars to probably a hundred or two hundred and fifty million dollars? Is it because of the war? No, sir; there is no war now between the people of the United States. Is it slavery? No, sir; there is no slavery in this country now; and while slavery did exist in this country no such necessity was ever thought to exist. Sir, if it is necessary, I affirm that it is because we have abolished slavery, and for no other reason. When the question of the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery was before the people, they were told that all that was necessary to settle forever the vexed and exciting questions about the negro was to vote for the amendment, abolish slavery, and that we would have no more trouble in regard to the negro race. Sir, I put the question to you, and through you, to this House and to the country, how many votes would have been given for abolishing slavery if the people had been made to know that, by abolishing slavery, they were bringing upon themselves an annual tax, for an indefinite period, of from twelve to two hundred and fifty million dollars? For one, sir, I do not believe that one half of the votes could have been obtained for that measure.

Mr. Speaker, we are here as the Representatives of the people who have to support this Government; they have honored us with this high position, not that we should unnecessarily burden them with taxation, but that we should only require such an amount of taxes as will be necessary to pay the expenses of the Government, economically administered, and in a reasonable time to pay all the just claims against the Government. Believing this to be the proper rule for our action here, I appeal to every gentleman in this House to pause and to give due consideration to the bill now before this House before he casts his vote for it.

Sir, the establishing or continuance of the Freedmen's Bureau is, in my judgment, not only unnecessary, but it is worse than nothing. If the vast amount of money required by this bill must be paid to the officers and employés under it, it would be far better to require them to remain at home, and let the people in each State regulate their own affairs in their own way, being subject to the Constitution of the United States and laws passed in accordance with it.

Mr. Speaker, it has, I believe, always been held by the purest and best statesmen in our country that it is extremely dangerous to put too much power into the hands of one or even a few men; but judging from the bill now before us, I suppose that that good and wholesome doctrine must go overboard, as well as every other principle in our old Government which we have all so long professed to admire.

The first section of the bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, and which we now have under consideration, contains these words, "That the act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law, and shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States," &c. Now, sir, I understand that the word "refugees," as used above, is intended to designate loyal whites who have had to leave their homes for their own safety, and have not been able on account of the danger of personal violence to return to their homes; and if I am right in this, I suppose that there is now none of that class anywhere in the United States. We are told that peace reigns now throughout our whole country, and that there is no danger to be apprehended in traveling in any portion of our country, except it may be from thieves and robbers; and if there are any now being supported by the Government, it is certainly wrong, unless the Government intends to take from the States that great privilege of supporting their own poor.

But it will be seen from that portion of the bill which I have quoted that the powers of this bureau are extended to every State in this Union. Why is it, sir, that this almost unlimited power should be extended everywhere? Why extend it to the northern States? Have they any refugees or freedmen there that they are unwilling to treat justly? I cannot think that the people of the northern States require that they should be interfered with in the management of their own affairs. No, sir; but on the contrary, judging from their almost continual intermeddling and interference in the affairs of other States, that they, like some of other days, were even above suspicion. Why, then, extend this vast machinery to those States? I may be told that the President will not, by appointing officers in every county in these States, so enlarge the expenditures of our Government, because it will be unnecessary to do so. If this be true, where, I ask, is the necessity for granting that power? This bill, if I am correctly informed, was drafted by a gentleman of great ability and experience. Surely he would not have granted this immense power without some grand object to be attained by it.

Mr. Speaker, I would not willingly come to the conclusion that this enlargement of the powers of this bureau was made for party or political purposes. But, sir, suppose this to have been the design; what other machine could have been put in operation that would give hope for the accomplishing of half so much? What more could a President desire (who might think proper to use such means) than to have the power to appoint a man of his own choice in every county in the United States, clothed with the power conferred by this bill? And not only this, but it confers the power to appoint hundreds of others, making altogether an army of office-holders, scattered all over the United States, whose influence may be brought to bear, in any political contest, greatly against the wishes and interests of the people.

In the second section of this bill we have the following, to wit:

That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, may divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in such district, and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent, either a citizen, officer of the Army, or enlisted man, who, if an officer, shall serve without additional compensation or allowance, and if a citizen or enlisted man shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,200 per annum. And the Commissioner may, when the same shall be necessary, assign to each assistant commissioner not exceeding three clerks, and to each of said agents one clerk, at an annual salary not exceeding $1,000 each, provided suitable clerks cannot be detailed from the Army. And the President of the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employés, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act, or the act to which this is additional.

Mr. Speaker, I have quoted this section of the bill to show the vast extent to which it is intended that this machine shall go. If it is thought proper by the Commissioner and the President, every county or parish in the United States is to be considered a district, and each one is to have an agent, and if that agent be a citizen or enlisted man he is to have a salary of $1,200 per annum. If, however, he should be an officer he may receive whatever he may be entitled to as an officer in the Army. Here, sir, we have a vast field opened out for the retention of military men. No other Government, I apprehend, has ever progressed so far in a time of peace. But, sir, this is not all. By the same section of this bill it is, in my judgment, made absolutely necessary to retain a large army in the field, if for no other purpose but simply to protect the employés, agents, and officers of this bureau. I am informed by General Howard, the Commissioner of this bureau, that at the time of making the report which was made by him to the present Congress there were in the employment of the bureau four hundred and thirteen officers and three hundred and seventy-five civilians, beside ten commissioners and himself, making in all seven hundred and ninety-nine men. This, it will be remembered, was when this bureau was restricted (by the law which gave it birth) to ten States. Now, if it required seven hundred and ninety-nine men to work this machine in ten States, how many will it take to work it in thirty-six States?

The third section of this bill says—

That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies, including medical stores and transportation, and afford such aid, medical or otherwise, as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

Sir, was there ever such vast and extensive power given to any man before by any Government on this globe? There is no amount that he may not take; there is no end to the debt that he may entail upon this Government, provided only that he may deem it needful. I may be told, sir, that the Secretary of War is an honest man, and that he will only issue such provisions as may be necessary. This may be true, sir; that he is honest in the strictest sense of that term it is not my purpose to question in the slightest degree; but if he is, I desire to keep him honest, and not to place a temptation before him of this character. By such means there is no doubt in my mind but that many honest men, even in our own country, have been induced to commit crimes which they never would have desired to do if the temptation had not been presented to them. It is therefore, Mr. Speaker, most improper and unsafe to confer more power upon any officer of this Government than is absolutely necessary to enable him to carry out the purposes for which the power is granted. Suppose that we should be so unfortunate as to have a dishonest man placed at the head of the War Department, what restriction does this bill place upon him in regard to this matter? None, sir; not a single one, except that he may deem it needful. How many of his friends, his political admirers, or those who will do his bidding, may he not enrich under the power here conferred only upon the condition that he may deem it needful for the temporary support of the freedmen, their wives and children?

The fourth section of this bill authorizes the President to reserve from sale or from settlement, for the use of freedmen and loyal refugees, unoccupied public lands in the States of Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, not exceeding in all three million acres of good land. These lands are to be allotted and assigned to the freedmen and refugees in parcels not exceeding forty acres to each. These lands they are to have at such annual rent as may be agreed upon between the Commissioner and themselves. The rental shall be based upon a valuation of the land, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may, under the direction of the President, by regulation prescribe.

In the sixth section of this bill it is provided: That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide or cause to be erected suitable buildings for asylums and schools. But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expense incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for such purposes. And no payments shall be made for lands purchased under this section, except for asylums and schools, from any monies not specifically appropriated therefor. And the Commissioner shall cause such lands from time to time to be valued, allotted, assigned, and sold in manner and form provided in the fourth section of this act, at a price not less than the cost thereof to the United States.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have, in my judgment, a development of the grand purposes and designs of those who introduced this bill. It is, sir, I have no doubt, to commence a colony in each one of the five States above named, which is ultimately to drive out the entire white population of those States and fill their places with the negro race. And whether this is the design or not, it is certain in my judgment to have this effect. And they could not have devised a more effectual scheme for that purpose. Sir, let us look at these provisions: in the first place they set apart the unoccupied public lands in those States for the use of the colored people. It is true they speak of loyal refugees; in this they may include white persons. But I presume that we all know that none of this class will be there. These lands are now in a wild state; they are either in forests or prairie. What is the first thing to be done? Are the colored people to go there and make their own improvements at their own expense as the white people in this country have always had to do? No, sir, we are to be more kind and liberal to them. The Secretary of War is to be clothed with authority to erect shelters and furnish provision, clothing, medical attention, and, in a word, do everything that he may deem needful for temporary support. But, sir, they do not stop here; this is not enough; the Commissioner is authorized to purchase sites and buildings for schools and asylums, to be used by these people, but to be held as United States property. And not only this, the Commissioner under the direction of the President is to have power to purchase or rent such tracts of land in the several districts aforesaid as may be necessary to provide for the indigent refugees and freedmen dependent upon the Government for support. Sir, who can estimate the cost for all this? How much is it to cost the Government to build shelters on all this unoccupied public land? What sort of shelters are they to be? How much is it to cost to feed, clothe, and furnish medical aid, &c., to these people until they can support themselves? Will they ever be in a condition to support themselves? How much is it to cost to purchase sites and buildings for schools and asylums? How many tracts of land will the Commissioner purchase under this authority? What is to be the size of the tracts? How much is he to pay per acre? How many farms will he rent, and what is he to pay for rent? Sir, these are important questions, the answers to which the people have a right to demand. But, sir, they will demand in vain; no living man can tell. And another still more important question, Mr. Speaker, is, how long is the Government to support these people? Will the white people who have to support the Government ever get done paying taxes to support the negroes? If this is not to continue always, why did not those who introduced this bill fix a time when all this was to stop?

Mr. Speaker, I have said that in my judgment, if this bill is passed, that its effect would be to drive the white people all out of the States named, and substitute in their place the colored people. Sir, it is not to be expected that the two races will live contentedly where there are large numbers of the colored people living near to neighborhoods settled with white persons; experience has proved to many of us, that wherever large numbers of colored people live, that the white people living within five or ten miles of the place become sufferers to a very large extent. Now, sir, if this should be the case (as I have no doubt it will) in the States in which you propose to establish these people, the whites and blacks will disagree to such an extent that when people find that the colored people are permanently established they will be compelled, in self defense, to seek a home somewhere else. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, but that those who prepared this bill saw that the difficulties and disagreements to which I have just alluded would arise, and hence they require that military jurisdiction and protection shall be extended, so as to give safety in their movements; and if the white inhabitants become dissatisfied, the Commissioner is prepared with authority by this bill to buy them out and put the negroes upon the land. Who, then, can doubt as to what is to be the effect of this bill if it becomes a law? But, sir, it may be said that the Commissioner is restrained or prohibited from purchasing or making contracts for these lands until Congress shall have made an appropriation to pay for them. Sir, if this bill is passed, I do not suppose that there will ever be much difficulty in getting Congress to make an appropriation, if it be recommended by the President and the Commissioner of this bureau. Sir, the necessity for purchasing these lands is admitted by those who vote for this measure; and if this is not so, why is it put in this bill?

Now, sir, there is another consideration which may afford a reason for extending this bureau to all parts of the United States. The Secretary of War is authorized to furnish transportation to these people to any extent that he may deem needful. And I understand that there are now large numbers of these people in some of the northern States, and also in Canada, who are anxious to return to their old homes, now that slavery is abolished. There are, I am informed, others who desire to emigrate to the northwestern States. Now, sir, if this be true, the Secretary of War is ready by authority to pay for the transportation of these people where ever they may wish to go. Surely, sir, we are extremely kind to these people. Why is it that they cannot pay their own transportation as the white people have to do? Have we not taxes enough to pay without adding to the enormous burdens now pressing upon us, simply to transport the negroes and their effects from one part of the country to another? Surely, sir, it is time to stop this sort of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, there is another portion of this very extraordinary bill to which I desire to ask the attention of this House. It is the fifth section of the bill, and reads as follows:

That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order. And no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years, unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Now, sir, I do not propose at this time to express any opinion in regard to the action of Major General Sherman upon that occasion. I only desire to say in regard to him that I regard him as one of the best military men known to this or any other age, a sound patriot and an able statesman. But, sir, I cannot see the propriety or the justice in singling out these people and bestowing upon them greater favors than upon any other colored people. Neither do I see the propriety nor justice in taking from the white people that which actually belongs to them and bestowing it upon any portion of the African race. Sir, I deny that Congress has the right thus to interfere with private property. The Constitution, which we have all taken an oath to support, expressly prohibits and forbids the taking of private property without just compensation. Sir, shall we now in time of peace disregard that Constitution and that oath for any purpose, much less to take property from white persons, who are, as I understand, the actual owners of the property, and give it to colored people or to any other race? For one, sir, I cannot do it. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose we have the right or authority under the Constitution to continue these people in possession of the lands referred to, would it be expedient, would it be better calculated to promote the interest of the Government than to allow the owners to take possession of their own lands? Sir, it is necessary in the present affairs of our country that the Government should afford all proper facilities to the people in order that they may be enabled to assist in paying the immense debt now resting upon us. Do gentlemen suppose that these lands in the possession of the colored people will afford any revenue to this Government? If so, I must confess, sir, that they differ very greatly from myself. But, Mr. Speaker, there is one condition upon which this bill does agree that the owner may have his land, and that is that he shall first have a settlement with the occupant, and of course get his consent, and then make the arrangement satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. Sir, why is it, if these people are free and are qualified to exercise the highest privileges that can be bestowed upon freemen, namely, the right of suffrage, why is it that they cannot be allowed the poor privilege to make a contract to give up to the owner property to which he has no right without having to obtain the consent of the Commissioner of this bureau? Sir, I do not covet such freedom as that, neither can I believe that where such supervision is necessary in order to protect the colored race that they are qualified to come in and take an equal stand by the side of the more intelligent, and participate in ruling this great nation by the exercise of the right of suffrage.

Mr. Speaker, there is another fact connected with this subject to which I desire to call the attention of this House, and that is the condition of the people who are the owners of these lands. I understand, sir, that perhaps the only property that they now own upon this earth is these lands. Many of these people are now old, and are tottering on the brink of the grave; many others, who are children, who are unable to do anything for a support, but who are as innocent, so far as the rebellion is concerned, as the child unborn; many others, females, who have no other means to depend upon for support except these lands. Sir, is it possible that gentlemen upon this floor can disregard the appeals that must be made by a knowledge of these facts, knowing these helpless people are now destitute? Sir, look at their condition. I imagine that I can almost hear the plaintive cries of these innocent children asking and beseeching their widowed mothers for bread or a morsel of something to eat. Yet that kind mother is unable to furnish that morsel, because all she owns has been taken by this Government and turned over to the colored people. Sir, I trust that that injustice will be continued no longer, but that these lands will be given back to their owners.

But, Mr. Speaker, a very objectionable feature of this bill is yet to be alluded to. It is that which requires a large army to be kept in the field in order to sustain and enforce obedience to this bureau and all of its requirements. Sir, who can tell how many soldiers it will take and what it will cost the white people of the United States to support and pay these soldiers? Sir, I learn from Major General Howard, as before stated, that the bureau had, at the time of making his report, three hundred and seventy-five civilians employed at an average of $100 per month, and four hundred and thirteen officers at an average pay of a captain in the line of the Army, which I suppose to be about one hundred and eighteen dollars and fifty cents per month; seven commissioners, receiving the pay of brigadier general, which I believe is $299 50 per month. Two receiving the pay of colonels, which I think is $194 per month, and one who is receiving the pay of major, which I suppose is $151; and Major General Howard himself is receiving the pay of a major general, which I understand to be $445 per month. This, sir, will require annually the clever little sum of $1,075,452. Now, sir, add to this the amount that will be required to pay the soldiers that must be kept for their protection, and then add the additional number of men that must be employed to work this machine all over the United States, and remember at the same time that the Commissioner of this bureau has already made a call for an appropriation, while he is only working in ten States, for nearly twelve million dollars for the next year. Who, sir, can tell what all this will amount to?

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the great progress that we have made in increasing the expenditures of this Government during the last forty-two or three years. By reference to Mr. Benton's Thirty Years' View, volume one, page 230, it will be found that General Smith, of Maryland, a member of the Senate of the United States, makes the statement that in 1822 the ordinary expenses of the Government were $9,827,643, and in 1823 the expenses amounted to the sum of $9,784,154. Now, sir, who could have thought at that day that in the comparatively short time of forty-three years it would require the sum of even $12,000,000 to fix up a machinery alone for the benefit of three or four million negroes, and more especially, sir, when it is understood that in 1820 we had a population, including white and colored, of 9,633,545. Mr. Speaker, how long will it be at this rate—when we take into consideration the fact that our Government proper, besides this little bureau machine, is now costing us hundreds of millions of dollars—how long, sir, will it be before we have to call in the services of Mr. Kennedy, of census notoriety to estimate the amount of the debt we owe? Sir, it is time that we should stop all useless expenditures, and let us return and imitate the examples given by our fathers, so that we may, like them, pay all just claims against us, and thus maintain the high credit of this great nation.

Mr. Speaker, I now desire to call the attention of the House to what I think has been, in most places, the effect of the operations of this bureau. I never did believe that it was doing the colored people any good, and I feel very sure that it has done the white people a great deal of harm. If in the place of establishing this bureau the authorities who made it had directed the colored people who were not in the Army to have remained at home with their owners until the ratification of the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery, there would have been nothing for this bureau to do, and the colored people would all have gone home, their owners would have supported them, and they would not have cost the Government one dollar, and would have been better cared for; and many poor colored women and children who are now resting in their lonely graves, or in the bottom of some river, would to-day be enjoying freedom with far better prospects than those who have been under the direction of this bureau. Sir, look at the condition that these people have been in, collected together in large numbers at the different camps or places of rendezvous, many of them doing nothing, without a shelter to put their heads under except as they crowded into tents or vacant houses in large numbers, sometimes having furnished to them by the Government plenty to eat, at other times being without anything, many of them living in filth and often exposed to inclement weather. This condition being such as they were not accustomed to, did of course bring on sickness and disease, which has terminated in the death of vast numbers of these people.

But, sir, the bureau was established, and the agents appointed to manage these people have generally been such as were deeply impressed with the belief that the former owners were the colored man's strongest enemy. Hence their actions have been predicated upon this, no doubt, honest conviction as to some of them, yet in fact a great error. The truth is that it was exactly the reverse, and I have no hesitation in saying to-day that in a very large majority of cases the former owner is their warmest friend; but, sir, many of the colored people were induced to think otherwise, and the action of the agents being predicated upon the conviction that their former owners were the negro's enemy, of course almost everything they have done has had a tendency to keep up that impression in the minds of the negroes, and hence the necessity, in the estimation of the managers, for a continuance of the bureau, and for a continuance of their official positions and their salaries; and together with the fact that it may be made a most powerful political machine to retain or destroy party purposes or power. Now, sir, to show that I am right in this, let me call the attention of this House to a letter recently addressed by Governor Orr, of the State of South Carolina, to the President of the United States. From this letter we learn that a Major Delany, a colored officer, was sent on an official tour of inspection, from department headquarters, through the sea-coast parishes. After having performed the duty assigned, the major says:

"I have met with a general representation of the intelligence and former wealth of the planters and large land owners of these districts, and large numbers of the freedmen of both sexes and every condition among them, and have generally found the planter ready and willing to enter into any agreement reasonable and just to both parties, planters and freedmen. All with whom I have yet met and had conversation on the subject of the planting interest, readily indorse the most liberal desires of the Government and the bureau toward the freedmen. And the freedmen express the most anxious desire to go to work on plantations, and simply hesitate for the purpose of receiving definite orders from the Government that they cannot obtain the lands by purchase or otherwise, when they will readily enter into arrangements to work or give place to those who will."

The Governor then says that—

"In the upper portions of this State, where the Freed-men's Bureau has never been organized and where post commanders chiefly had charge of the relations and conditions of the freedmen, this delusion was never as strong as lower down, and yet it was strong enough to prevent any contracts being made before the 1st of January, 1865. Up to that time the freedmen believed in the certainty of their future proprietorship. Since that day has passed they are manifesting much greater willingness to meet the necessities of their condition. But in the lower part of the State the condition of things is different. Here scarcely a contract has been or can be made. The delay in carrying out your instructions positively, which has continued from General Howard's visit in October to Captain Ketchum's return in the last few days, rendered the freedmen, as a body, incredulous of any restoration. They have in many places quietly but firmly refused to accept any terms. But I regret to say that within the last few days they have in some instances resorted to violence, burning down dwellings, destroying bridges, intrenching themselves in their quarters, and refusing either to contract or give way to those who will. And in these cases it is proper to say that the contracts offered them have been approved by the United States authorities as liberal and just."

Now, sir, if this be true, as I have no doubt it is, why should we enlarge the powers of this bureau, and extend it to every State and county in the United States, and prolong its existence for an indefinite period?

Mr. Speaker, that there will be some difficulties between the ill-disposed white men and the colored people no man can doubt, no matter what plan may be adopted by the Government. But, sir, I hold that there are good men enough in every State and county in these United States to regulate and control their communities so as to have justice done to all of their inhabitants as far as it can be done; and if left to themselves to regulate their own affairs in their own way, being subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of their own States, that they will accomplish the grand objects for which this Government was instituted much sooner and much more happily than will be done if men are sent from other States, who are strangers to the dispositions and habits of our people, men who come there with firm convictions, made mostly by misrepresentations by interested parties or those who do not know the true facts of the case, with power to institute new courts, to be themselves the judges and jury, to drag the citizens into a court established not for all, but alone for the benefit of the negro, and where in almost every case the impression is made that the negro is by the judge the preferred man of the crowd. Sir, it is mere folly to suppose that harmony and good feeling can prevail under such circumstances. Sir, allow me to say again, that in the country where I live there is no ill feeling against the negro on account of his having been made free. All know that it was white people who did that, and no one blames the negro for wanting to be free; and I am sure that it is the intention of all good men throughout the entire State to submit to the powers that be, obey the Constitution and laws of the country, as a very large majority of her citizens have always done, and thus do equal justice to all.

Mr. ROUSSEAU obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment. I do not desire to disturb the gentleman in the course of his remarks. I went to my room since I last had the pleasure of addressing the House and found the newspaper to which I referred. It is the Tuscaloosa Observer of Saturday, December 9, 1865, being the twenty-sixth number of the nineteenth volume of that paper. I find that I was mistaken in saying that five persons had been hung; there were three—two men and one woman:

"CIRCUIT COURT.—The following are some of the leading cases tried and disposed of by the court, up to Friday, 8th instant, to wit:

"KINION, a freedman—Larceny; Penitentiary for 5 years.

JOHN and ROMAN, freedmen—Larceny of horse; Penitentiary for 12 years.

DAVID, a freedman—Larceny of horse; Penitentiary for 99 years.

AARON and ELI, freedmen—Larceny of horses; Aaron to be hanged—Eli, Penitentiary for 25 years.

ROBIN, a freedman—Assault to murder; Penitentiary for 3 years.

RILEY, a freedman—Stealing watch from dwelling; Penitentiary for 5 years.

ELIZA, a freedwoman—Larceny; Penitentiary for 5 years.

ELSEY and PHIL, freedmen—Larceny of horses; to be hanged.

"SALLY, freedwoman—Larceny from a dwelling; Penitentiary for 5 years.

"EMELINE and MARGARET—Murder; case undecided.

The criminal docket for this special term is large beyond precedent; and unless the negro population reform, and that speedily, penitentiaries will have to be erected in every county instead of every State. This is a lamentable state of things, but is nevertheless true in every particular. The negro, ought, if possible, to be kept from congregating in our towns and cities, his true place being the plantation. Separated from this, he cannot obtain a bare subsistence; hence he has necessarily to plunder and steal to supply the wants of nature. This will be a grave subject for our law-makers to cogitate upon."

Mr. DAWES. What is the judge's name?
Mr. KELLEY. It is not given—simply the proceedings in the circuit court in Alabama.

Mr. DAWES. Was it in a State court or a United States court?

Mr. KELLEY. A State court, I presume, although it is not distinctly announced.

Mr. ROUSSEAU addressed the House. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SHANKLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. If my colleague will give way, I will state that I withdraw my objection to an evening session.

Mr. SHANKLIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SMITH. As my colleague is willing to yield for a recess, I will move that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. GRINNELL in the chair.) The Chair can entertain no motion but to adjourn. But the object of the gentleman can be attained by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

And the House accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. GRINNELL, as Speaker pro tempore, in the chair.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The House resumed the consideration of the substitute reported from the select committee on freedmen's affairs for Senate bill No. 60, to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau; upon which Mr. SHANKLIN was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will my colleague [Mr. SHANKLIN] allow me a moment, for the purpose of making an explanation?

Mr. SHANKLIN. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. General Spencer was alluded to during the discussion this afternoon, and I then said that I knew of no such general in Alabama, and I gave my reasons for my statement. Since then I have ascertained that General Spencer is a real personage; that he went to Alabama from Kansas as a sutler of a Kansas regiment. He was a very clever gentleman, no doubt, and he was appointed colonel of an Alabama regiment, at Tuscaloosa, by General Dodge. I had never heard of the gentleman, before, and I would be very sorry to do him any injustice. I understand he is a clever man, and has done some service to the country. But he was not in the service in Alabama while I was there, but went with General Sherman on his march; hence I knew nothing of him.

Mr. SHANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor I have been a silent but I hope a not inattentive observer of the passing events in this House. I would have rejoiced if I could consistently have remained silent, consistently with the duty which I owe to myself and to an intelligent and patriotic constituency who have so generously confided their interests to my care. I would prefer to continue a course which would have been most congenial to my feelings. But when a measure of such great and vital importance to my native State, which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, and to eleven other States in this Union that have no Representatives here—a measure intended to operate peculiarly upon my State and those others without a voice here, for the doors of this Hall have been closed and barred against them, I feel that I would be criminally recreant to my own duty and my responsibility to my constituency if I remained silent or failed to enter my solemn protest against the passage of this measure.

I do not intend, as many gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate have seen proper to do, to launch out into the wide field of party and political discussion. I design to confine myself closely to the subject which is before us now for consideration.

The bill under consideration proposes to extend the provisions of an act of the last Congress, which establishes the Freedmen's Bureau in the War Office of this Government. According to the provisions of that act of the last session the jurisdiction of this bureau was confined to the States which had been in rebellion. It was stated to be a necessary war measure, and according to its own limitations it was to exist and continue so long as that war should continue, and for twelve months after its expiration. This bill proposes to extend the operation of this bureau for an indefinite period of time, and not only to extend the time of its operation, but also to add to its present powers the most alarming powers that have ever been suggested by any man upon any subject in a free republican Government.

According to the provisions of the bill now under consideration, the President of the United States is to have the right to appoint, by and with the advice of the Senate, twelve assistant commissioners of the Freedmen's Bureau. That is, he is to have the right to lay off the whole country into districts, not to exceed twelve in number, and to appoint an assistant commissioner for each one of those districts. And it is further proposed that in each of those twelve districts sub-commissioners may be appointed equal to the number of counties or parishes in that district.

I do not know how many counties there are in all the States of this Union; I have understood, however, that there are one thousand eight hundred and seventy. If there be that number of counties in the whole Union, then, according to the provisions of this bill, there may be appointed one thousand eight hundred and seventy sub-commissioners, in addition to the assistant commissioners and the chief Commissioner. According to the provisions of the bill, the chief Commissioner of this bureau is to have the right to employ ten clerks. Each of the twelve assistant commissioners is to be authorized to employ six clerks; and each of the sub-commissioners, numbering in all one thousand eight hundred and seventy, is to be authorized to employ two clerks. Do you not see, sir, what a host of officers are proposed to be created by this measure, extending all over the United States? There are to be one thousand eight hundred and seventy sub-commissioners, and more than three thousand seven hundred clerks.

This is not all. The bill provides that the Secretary of War shall issue rations and clothing, and supply medical attendance to these freedmen. How many quartermasters, how many commissaries, and how many clerks are to be employed in this way, no human being can tell. They may number thousands. Under the provisions of this bill, officers may be created to the number of ten thousand, or twenty thousand, or even fifty thousand, if party necessities require it.

All these officers are to have good salaries. The chief Commissioner is to receive $3,000 per annum. The twelve assistant commissioners are to have, I believe, about $2,500 a year. The sub-commissioners are to be paid at a rate not exceeding $1,500 a year. These various clerks are to receive some $1,200 a year. It is provided that the salaries shall not exceed those sums; but whoever knew an instance in which the largest amount of salary allowed by law was not paid?

Then, as these freedmen are to have medical attention, how many physicians or surgeons will be employed to attend to the four million freedmen and refugees? No human being can now tell.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is to be the jurisdiction of the vast army of officers to be created by this bill? In the first place, they are to have jurisdiction and control over three million acres of "good land" in the States of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas. It must be "good land." Poor land will not do for these "American citizens of African descent" to live upon. The poor land of the mountain and the hill-side must be appropriated to the poor white laborer. This favorite race, the negroes, must have good land.

These three million acres of land are to be divided into farms or lots not exceeding forty acres and set apart for the use of these freedmen. In addition to that, this bill provides that the President of the United States, through the Secretary of War and the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, may purchase any additional amount of land wherever the operations of this bureau may extend, for the purpose of providing homes for the freedmen. Thus, Mr. Speaker, there is no limit to the amount of land that may be controlled and managed by this bureau.

Again, the bill authorizes the purchase of land for the erection of school-houses and other institutions necessary for the freedmen. If school-houses be erected, you must have preachers or teachers; and no doubt those political preachers who have covered the land during the war will be the favored recipients of these appointments. You must provide for them, and they will doubtless be sent to those school-houses to teach those freedmen. What will they teach them? I suppose that in the first place they will teach them to spell a little and read a little; and then I suppose they will be taught a little of the Lord's will and a great deal of the wiles and wickedness of the devil.

But these four million freedmen are to be taught their duty. And what is that great duty? In the first place, they must be taught to hate the people among whom they live with all the hatred of their nature. That is an important matter to teach them—to hate those who had been their masters, and with whom they had lived. Next in importance, they must be taught by these political preachers to vote the whole Abolition or Republican ticket.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are important matters to operate for party purposes; but they are expensive matters to the country, which is already borne down with debt. What will all this machinery cost the Government of the United States if it be put into full and successful operation with thousands of officers all with rich salaries? My colleague who sits on my left, to-day estimated the cost of this machinery when put into operation, at $10,000,000 per annum. I am satisfied my friend did not cipher this out according to the Republican rules. If he had he would have made it ten times ten million dollars when this bill goes into operation. I saw a calculation which was made by a distinguished Senator, and according to that calculation it will cost the Government of the United States to put this gigantic machinery into operation more than $250,000,000; and if it is put into operation with all of its appendages and paraphernalia, perhaps $250,000,000 would be inadequate for the purpose.

But we are told that three million acres of land are to come under the operation of this bureau; and there is something in the bill about the manner of ascertaining the value of the rent for the land. Now, does any man who knows anything about the character and habits of the negro when left to himself suppose one dollar of money raised from these lands will ever reach the Treasury of the United States? Why, sir, it will stop between the negro who enjoys the land and the Treasury of the United States, and find its way into the pockets of the vampires who are sucking the life-blood of the nation. Never a dollar of money will reach the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, what will be the cost if this bill provides that these negroes—I beg pardon for using the word negro as it is not fashionable, but freedmen—shall be fed and clothed? What is it to cost to feed and clothe them? Can any man tell me? Some of these men I know are disposed to work if left to themselves. They are honest men and disposed to work for a living, but many more have no such disposition. These lazy and worthless men will gather around the Freedmen's Bureau to be fed and clothed, and those who are disposed to work, seeing these men who they know to be inferior to themselves, taken care of, fed and clothed and housed, will ask why they should not also enjoy the beneficence of the Government. The effect of this measure upon the negro population—and I speak from my knowledge of the negro population—will be to paralyze their energy, destroy their industry, and make them paupers and vagabonds.

Mr. Speaker, I have only given the outlines of the powers and jurisdiction and extent of this gigantic monster called the Freedmen's Bureau. I shall now call your attention to the reasons assigned for the creation of this monster, and they are few; its creation is a violation of the Constitution, every principle of the Constitution of our fathers. I have heard no gentleman attempt to justify the creation of this Bureau from that Constitution of the United States. They refer to the second section of the amendment to the Constitution. When the question of the ratification of the amendment to the Constitution was up in my State, those who were opposed to it opposed it upon the ground that it would be construed to give power to Congress to legislate on the subject. They told us our suspicions were unfounded, and that the second section gave no such powers to the United States; that it was only intended to carry out and secure to the negro his personal freedom, such as all the free negroes then enjoyed; that they and their friends of the amendment was as much opposed to negro equality or negro suffrage or to conferring the power on Congress to extending these privileges to the negro, as those that opposed the amendment; that the section was not susceptible of any such construction. And under that protest they induced thousands to vote for the amendment, believing that by freeing the negro they would exclude from the Halls of Congress that exciting question.

What is the next argument in favor of the creation of this unrestricted, dangerous monster? It is the necessity of it. It is said that here are four million ignorant and helpless negroes that have been thrown upon the country by this war who cannot provide for themselves, and that something must be done. There is a necessity! Whether it is a military necessity or a moral necessity I do not know, but a necessity of some kind for the protection and support of these people. And the honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill says it is necessary to protect these people against the prejudice and hatred of those who have been their masters. I would say to the gentleman that he knows nothing of the feelings of these men toward that unhappy class when he supposes that the masters entertain any feelings of hostility or unkindness to that unfortunate race. They have compassion upon them. That feeling of friendship and kindness which grew up during their servitude is not obliterated by the act of emancipation at all. I speak as one who was born and reared among slaveholders and among slaves. And I speak what I know when I say that though there may be exceptional cases, yet, as a general thing, there is no feeling of hostility upon the part of the masters toward this unfortunate class, but, on the contrary, a degree of sympathy and of kindness that is unknown to or not understood by the people of the North.

I can say to that gentleman furthermore, that so far as regards any feeling of prejudice or hostility being created by the act of emancipation, it is not toward the negro, but toward that class of fanatical abolitionists of the North who have come down among the negroes in the southern country, and by promises, persuasions, and misrepresentations have demoralized the negroes, who were a contented, quiet, and peaceable class heretofore, well fed and well clothed. These abolitionists have rendered the negroes not only worthless, but through the demoralizing influences of the fanatical abolitionists the negro has commenced lying, stealing, and pilfering.

We are further told, as another reason why this measure shall be adopted, that it is necessary to educate the negro, that he is in a state of ignorance and stupidity, and that as we are going to make him an American citizen, and that speedily, it is necessary to educate him. Sir, I believe it is necessary to educate him; but is the machinery of this bill the appropriate means of doing so? Does it provide in the proper manner for his education? Why have this legion of officers there to superintend their control? A few days ago, when a proposition was before the House to confer the right of suffrage in this District, he was then held up as a man of talent and of genius. He seemed to be intuitively educated and capable of exercising all the rights of the freeman. But when it becomes necessary to create all these offices for party purposes, then the negro must be degraded, unfit for anything, unable to take care of himself, so that he must be educated in order to be able to discharge the high and responsible duties of an American citizen.

Mr. Speaker, as a principle of law I hold that no individual or party can avail themselves of the necessity which they themselves have created by their own improper and unlawful act. It is a maxim of law that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong. Now, if this necessity has been created by the party who are urging this measure, they have no right to avail themselves of it.

But how did that necessity spring up? It sprung from the same source from which all our difficulties arose during the last three years of this war. And that was, involving the negro question in the prosecution of the war. There was no necessity—I boldly assert it—of dragging that question into the war. I know some gentlemen thought it was necessary in order to put down the rebellion to destroy the institution of slavery, but I deny it. I hold, and I think I can demonstrate it to the satisfaction of any impartial mind, that by dragging that question into the war you prolonged it and intensified it, and it has cost this nation the blood of thousands upon thousands of our citizens, and it has cost us millions of treasure. Not only that, but it has caused the desolation of a large portion of this country by dragging into the issue the negro question. We have every reason to believe, from all the information we have, that at the outset of the war the southern people were divided and that a majority of them in most of the seceding States were opposed to the acts of secession and opposed to the war; but, unfortunately for them, unfortunately for us, the military and civil power in those States was in the hands of men who wanted a separation of the Union, and the majority of the people were coerced and dragged into the war against their consent and will, and the Government of the United States was unwilling or unable to give to the people that protection and support which their condition required. Hence they were subjugated and controlled by the secessionists, while their sentiments were true and loyal to the Government of the United States and the flag of the country. But when this negro policy was inaugurated and put in force, then they saw a war made upon their institutions, a war upon their property and their homes, and they lost that zeal which they had felt for the Government previous to that time; they were united to a considerable extent by the adoption of this policy, and the arm of the rebel government was strengthened. You divided public sentiment at home, and, to some extent, paralyzed our power to suppress this rebellion. If this war had been conducted on strictly constitutional grounds the rebellion, in my judgment, would have ceased long before it did cease, and the country to-day would have been in peace, harmony, and prosperity.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not pretend to discuss that subject further at this time. One gentleman said that it was necessary this bill should pass in order to educate these negroes in the southern States. The gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] a gentleman who comes from a State located in the northwest corner of creation, tells us that it is necessary that this bill shall pass in order to build up a great system of education in the South. And yet he, a gentleman who comes from a State where the track of the wild Indian and the buffalo is not yet obliterated by the march of civilization—and if they were they may be succeeded by the track of the grave and philosophical ass, and I do not know that the world would gain much thereby—rises in his place upon this floor and declares that the mass of the people in the land of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Marshall, Patrick Henry, Jackson, and Clay, who have shed more glory and renown upon the American name and character, is semi-civilized and barbarous, and that we are ignorant, and therefore we must disseminate schools there in order to educate its "ignorant and illiterate" population. He tells you that it is necessary that the General Government shall send to that benighted land their northern teachers to enlighten the people. Sir, we are told in Holy Writ that when Moses was leading the children of Israel through the wilderness they became wicked and degenerate, and it was necessary to raise a brazen serpent in the wilderness, that whoever looked upon it might be healed of their maladies. Might we not ask this distinguished philosopher, who comes from a land where the great luminary of day shines but a few hours each day at some seasons of the year, to come and take a position upon the highest peak of the range of Alleghany mountains in the domain of my friends from West Virginia, and hold himself up there, that these benighted people of the South might come and look upon him, and be relieved of their ignorance and stupidity?

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that there is another reason why this bill ought to pass; that it ought to pass as a punishment to those men who have sinned against the Government of the United States. They have sinned. Sir, I have ever held in detestation the doctrine of secession. I have ever detested the acts of those men who plunged this country into revolution and war; but while I have detested that doctrine as a political heresy, I have, at the same time, more detested and condemned as a political heresy the doctrine of abolition. But we are told that we must adopt this and kindred measures as a punishment upon these people for their sins. Well, we have punished them. They have sinned, and sinned greatly, and we have punished them, and punished them severely. We have drenched their land with the blood of their young men; we have desolated their fields and burned their houses, and destroyed their cities and villages. We have brought them to terms; we have made them surrender their armies and ask pardon of this Government. Have we not done enough? Have we not punished them for their sins, however great they may have been?

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] a few days ago, in the discussion on the negro suffrage bill for the District of Columbia, said that he advocated that measure as a measure of retributive justice, as a punishment upon these people. He upon that occasion further stated, "that Congress in this District had the power to punish by ballot, and there will be a beautiful poetic justice in the exercise of this power, so let it be applied."

There may be poetry, and music, too, to the ear of the gentleman in inflicting punishment upon an unarmed and helpless enemy; the cries of the old and decrepid men, the helpless women and children. But there is no such pleasure enjoyed by our brave and gallant soldier, who met the armed enemy on the field of battle. Ask your brave soldiers for what they fought the battles of their country. They will tell you that those men had outraged their country's honor and flag, and they have compelled them to surrender their political heresy; they have devastated their country; they have burned their cities and towns, and have inflicted full and complete punishment upon them. And now these gentlemen, who during the war did not with arms undertake to punish these men, come up and propose to make such legislation for their further punishment. And, now that the young and able-bodied men of these States have been killed in battle by the hundred thousand, the old men and the women and children are to be punished by legislative enactment. We are told that these measures are necessary for the punishment of these people.

And who are you going to punish? Will you kill a dead man? That, I believe, was attempted on one occasion. We are told that Falstaff killed Hotspur after he was dead, and took the body on his back, and carried it off as proof of his valor. He was one of those prudent men who would rather kill dead men than undertake to kill live men with weapons in their hands. And I suppose there will be about as much glory in punishing the decrepit old men and the women and children in these southern States as there was in Falstaff exercising his prudent valor upon the lifeless remains of Hotspur.

But I will consider more particularly the features of this gigantic bill, with all its dangerous powers. By the seventh section it is provided that wherever any discrimination is made between the whites and blacks on account of color or race, these commissioners, with full military power and jurisdiction, are to take cognizance of it, and try all cases that may arise according to rules and regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President. What cases are provided for by this bill as coming within the jurisdiction of these commissioners? All cases of discrimination made by the laws of the State or by custom or by habit? And how are these commissioners to try these cases under rules which may be prescribed by the President of the United States? How can the President prescribe rules for them, except by annulling the provisions of your constitutions and all your laws, and the customs and habits of society, in regard to color or race? The Commissioner is to wipe them all out by his own individual power, and there is to be no appeal from his decision.

And the eighth section of this bill provides that if any one shall under any State law, ordinance, rule, regulation, custom, or habit, deprive any portion of the community on account of race or color of any civil right or privilege, he shall be subject to arrest and brought before this tribunal, tried, and sentenced to pay a fine of $1,000, or to be imprisoned for twelve months, or both, at his discretion. There is to be no investigation before a jury, and no appeal from the decision of the Commissioner, who is to decide on ex parte testimony.

Now, is that a free country where laws of this sort can exist? According to the literal construction of the provisions of this bill, you may inflict this punishment upon the judge of your State court, who has taken an oath to support the constitution of the State and enforce its laws. Any discrimination between a white man and a negro may be so punished. The discrimination may be in favor of the negro, as is the case in some respects under the laws of Kentucky. In that State if a white man commits a larceny he is punished by confinement in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the jury. If the slave committed a similar offense he was punished by lashes not exceeding thirty-nine. The white man may be punished in the penitentiary to a greater extent than the negro would be.

If there is any discrimination by the laws of the State, and the judge observes the oath he has taken to support the constitution and laws of his State, he is subjected to the jurisdiction of this Freedmen's Bureau, and may be fined and imprisoned without any possible chance for him to secure a trial by jury or to take an appeal from that decision. Is that freedom?

Is that justice? No, sir, it is not. It is tyranny, it is despotism of the worst kind, and should be condemned by every citizen that loves justice or civil liberty.

This bill is intended to operate upon States which have been in rebellion, and upon those border slave-holding States which stood like bulwarks between the rebels and the northern States during this gigantic war. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HILL] has offered an amendment to this bill proposing to limit the jurisdiction of this Freedmen's Bureau to the States recently in rebellion, and the four slave States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, which adhered to the Union. If these other States are exempt from the operations of this bill, why should Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and Delaware be included? Because they have suffered more during this war than the more northern States? Because their fields, their villages, and their towns have been burned, and their people robbed and murdered? Because every disaster attending the war has been inflicted upon them? Is this the reason they must be put under the jurisdiction of this Freedmen's Bureau? Is it fair, is it just, to subject them to this system of government? In placing them under the jurisdiction of this bureau, is it the object to insult and humiliate the people of those States and degrade their manhood? It cannot be pretended that Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and many other of the northern States have not within their limits large numbers of freedmen and refugees. I have no doubt that there are in the State of Ohio to-day fifty thousand of these people, and an equal number in the States of Indiana and Illinois respectively. Why are the free negroes in those States to be neglected and overlooked? Do they not stand as much in need of protection (if protection of these people is the object of the bill) as the freedmen in the State of Kentucky? I contend that in Kentucky the free negroes are treated with more humanity and consideration than in the States I have mentioned. Our laws in Kentucky are as favorable to the freedmen as the laws of either of those States. Our people are as kind, as liberal, and as just toward the freedmen as the people of the States I have named. My own State has sacrificed not less than two hundred million dollars of property to maintain this Union, while many of the northern States, and particularly New England, grew rich from her manufactures during the war. Kentucky has poured out as much blood to sustain the flag of the country as any other State of no greater population. And for this she is to be insulted and degraded by the presence of a tribunal more despotic than can be found in any civilized country upon the globe?

But, Mr. Speaker, there are eleven States that have no Representatives upon this floor; and upon these this bill is designed particularly to operate. I ask whether it is just or magnanimous to impose upon those States a system of government like this without allowing their wishes to be heard in reference to the matter? Why not allow them to be heard? Why not give them an opportunity to plead their own cause, to represent their own most vital interests? I affirm, sir, that in legislating for those States, or without allowing them any representation in these Halls, you are violating one of the cardinal principles of republican government; you are tearing down the main pillar upon which our whole fabric of Government rests; you are sowing broadcast the seeds of revolution and ruin. Mr. Speaker, if the object of gentlemen here is to restore harmony and peace and prosperity throughout the Union, why do they adopt measures thus insulting, tyrannical, and oppressive in their character? Is this the way to restore harmony and peace and prosperity? How can you expect to gain the respect and affection of those people by heaping upon them insult and injustice? If they have the spirit of their ancestors, you may crush them, you may slay them, but you can never cause them to love you or respect you; and they ought not while you force upon them measures which are only intended to degrade them. Let us rise to the spirit of true wisdom and statesmanship, and treat those people in a manner calculated to win back their affection for the Union. Let us treat them with humanity and kindness, or at least with justice. I believe that they are anxious to perform in good faith the duties of American citizens if they be met in a proper spirit; but so long as such measures as negro suffrage, negro equality, and the Freedmen's Bureau are thrust upon these people, you may expect no restoration of peace and brotherly love. By such unjust and tyrannical legislation you will only kindle the flames of discontent and help to render a return of our country's former harmony and prosperity impossible.

Mr. PHELPS and Mr. CHANLER addressed the House. [Their remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

At the conclusion of Mr. CHANLER's remarks, Mr. TRIMBLE obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. HOGAN, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at nine o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 5, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I deem it proper to say in consequence of my not being present when the final vote was taken on Friday on the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication, that had I been present I should have voted in favor of its passage.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of a convention of teachers and friends of popular education, held at Winona, Minnesota, on the 30th and 31st of August, 1865, recommending the establishment of a national bureau of education, and the granting of lands to the several States for the establishment and support of training schools for teachers, as has been done for the establishment of agricultural colleges; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying Congress to levy a tariff sufficient to give adequate protection to American industry; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of citizens of South Haven, Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the purpose of building a light-house and pier light at the mouth of the South Black river, in the county of Van Buren, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of South Haven, Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of South Black river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of General Philip H. Sheridan and other officers of the Army, praying for an increase of the compensation of Army officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Warren Garrett and others, citizens of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, praying Congress to so amend the Constitution as to forever prohibit any State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges between persons on account of race or color; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. FOOT presented a petition of citizens of Washington, praying that early action may be taken in relation to the purchase of squares 687 and 688, embraced within the proposed extension of the Capitol grounds; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying Congress to levy a tariff sufficient to give adequate protection to American industry; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLARK presented the petition of Mrs. Rebecca S. Minor, praying for compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army in the years 1863 and 1864, in Natchez, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GUTHRIE presented a petition of manufacturers of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the taxes upon sales of agricultural implements, and for the removal of the tax now assessed upon castings made by themselves for their own machines; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NESMITH presented the memorial of Robert W. Dunbar, praying to be reimbursed for damages sustained by him in consequence of a revocation of his appointment as agent to take charge of public property at Orford, in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of citizens of Fayette county, Pennsylvania, praying that an amendment to the Constitution be adopted to prevent any State from making a distinction hereafter in civil rights and privileges among the naturalized citizens of the United States residing within its limits, or among persons born on its soil, on account of race, color, or descent; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the executive committee of the Montgomery County Tobacco Growers' Association of Ohio, praying to be placed upon an equality in relation to the tax on tobacco according to the relative value of the tobacco produced in that portion of the State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented three petitions of manufacturers of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the tax upon sales of agricultural implements, and for the removal of the tax now assessed upon castings made by themselves for their own machines; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of George H. Wells, a citizen of Marietta, Ohio, praying for compensation for the loss of his steamboat, Southern Merchant, which, he alleges, was taken from him by the rebels at the beginning of the war, was recaptured by our forces from the rebels, and was sold by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of Miss Clara Barton, which, as it contains some very interesting statements, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to read and to more particularly state to the Senate than ordinary petitions are stated. She states that during the time our prisoners were being landed at Annapolis last winter she received a large number of letters from all parts of the country, mostly from the wives and mothers of soldiers, desiring her personal assistance in searching for their lost husbands and sons who, they had reason to fear, had languished or died in southern prisons. The intense anxiety and excitement, amounting in many instances nearly to insanity, which characterized these letters, led her to regard this as the most poignant grief, and perhaps the most pressing necessity at that moment known to our people, prompting her at the same time to devise some means of relief. She decided, if possible, to obtain permission from the Government to inform the public that she would receive and answer all letters addressed to her at Annapolis by the friends of prisoners; that she would then publish the names thus obtained in lists, and cause them to be posted in the barracks, with the request that all paroled prisoners would examine, and transmit to her, by letter or otherwise, such information as they might possess of all persons whose names appeared there. The information thus gained was forwarded to the person who had made the inquiry, including always the address of the soldier who had conferred the information, thus placing in communication the friends of the missing man and the person professing to have knowledge of him, with a view to further inquiry if desirable, or of protecting themselves against imposition or mistake by a course of personal investigation, constituting the friends as well as herself judges of the accuracy of the intelligence conveyed.

Her suggestions were received by President Lincoln and submitted to Major General Hitchcock, under whose direction a few lines addressed to the friends of Union prisoners appeared in the Chronicle newspaper of this city, and were copied by other papers. In four days three hundred and sixty letters awaited her at Annapolis, and they continued to follow at the rate of a hundred per day until the order for discharging prisoners of war and returning them to their homes rendered it necessary for her either to abandon the search or change her original plan, the results of which had exceeded her expectations. The information sought rested almost entirely with returned prisoners who would now become citizens and scattered over the entire country. They were enfeebled men, and the knowledge of the facts now living in their memories would die with them. She thought her duty plain, and determined to continue her search by means of printed rolls circulated over the entire loyal States. This required substantial aid, and she sought it at the hands of our present Chief Magistrate, with the indorsement of a number of general officers, among whom was Lieutenant General Grant. By special direction of President Johnson, the printing of the rolls was assumed by the Government.

Securing the services of competent clerks, she recommenced her duties in May. Under this enlarged system she was no longer under the necessity of confining her labors to prisoners, and she decided to include in her search all missing men of the Army. During the month of June she printed and put in circulation twenty thousand copies of a roll containing fifteen hundred names of soldiers who had disappeared from the knowledge of their families and friends, and of whose personal existence or condition no knowledge was to be obtained from official sources. A copy of this roll was sent to every point from which it was thought information might be derived, including every post office in the loyal States, accompanied with a request for information as to each and every name contained on it. Each name in regard to which inquiry had been made was, as received, entered upon a book in ledger form, in alphabetical order, specifying, first, the name of the missing soldier with a number designating the order of the receipt of the inquiry; second, his company, regiment, and arm of the service; third, the name and residence of the person making the inquiry; and fourth, the date of its receipt. Corresponding columns were left for entries of information that might be received, and in these were noted as received the name and address of the person giving the information, the date of its receipt, and a brief note of its nature. Sometimes more than one inquiry was made for the same soldier, and often information concerning him was received from more than one person, but in either case all were noted under the same name and number on the register. As information was received from any quarter it was at once communicated to the person or persons making the inquiries, together with the name and address of the person giving the information, thus putting the seeker in direct communication with the possessor of information. Of the fifteen hundred names contained on this first roll she received information of something over one thousand, or more than two thirds of the entire number.

In July last she issued a second roll containing about the same number of additional names, but this roll, from want of means to carry out her project according to its original design, was never fully circulated. She has since received inquiries for still other missing men, sufficient to make probably more than three other rolls of the same size, or to the total amount of probably seven thousand five hundred men.

This entire labor of correspondence, of registry, of preparation, and publication of rolls, has so far been carried on by her own efforts and at her own expense, with the exception only of the printing of rolls as before stated. She states that she has been compelled to suspend her operations simply from the lack of means to carry them on, the work having so far outgrown her expectations. And yet the work can hardly be said to have been fairly commenced. The inquiries received probably include but a small fraction of those reported "missing;" and whose friends still wait in suspense and lingering hope, harder to bear than even the certainty of death. And of those for whom she has received inquiries but a small proportion have yet been properly sought after, and that information obtained of them which the system properly carried out would bring to light.

She thus finds herself to-day, she says, in possession of a well-organized system of successful search for the missing men of the United States Army. Having originated and carried it forward by herself eight months, and, as she believes, fully demonstrated its practicability, exhausting her means in the effort, she has decided to submit it to the Government for its more wise consideration and action if deemed proper. In order to secure the best measure of success, the work must be vigorously prosecuted, as the sources of information are rapidly wasting away by disease and premature death.

She has found that a soldier's name stands sometimes upon the official records of his Government with the dark word "deserter" written against it, while his family has evidence more or less positive that he lay long months after this an honest captive in rebel prisons and died there. The same course which would serve to throw light upon this case, would aid in bringing to view precisely the opposite, if it existed. Such cases as the above, together with all those respecting whose fate the records are silent, she would suggest as suitable names to be placed upon rolls for distribution throughout the country, after the manner in which she has hitherto, without access to records, found it necessary to deal with all.

There will, when all has been done which lies in mortal power, be still a percentage remaining of men upon whose fate no light will ever gleam until the graves open and the sea gives up its dead; but this will be less than is generally at this day supposed. Her observation warrants her in venturing the opinion that with suitable facilities some trace may be gained of four fifths of all who have disappeared amid the quicksands of war.

How this work shall be carried on in the future is for the Government to decide. That it should not be permitted to cease would seem to be a proposition on which all right-minded persons must agree. The Government owes it no less to the brave men who lie in unknown graves than to the anxious and longing friends in whom hope is not yet wholly dead, to see that no stone is left unturned to complete the personal record of all its preservers. Whether the work shall be continued by the Government in her hands or placed in those of others she leaves for the wisdom of Congress to determine; and she submits this statement of what she has done and designed, with the prayer that it may in some form be assumed by the Government whose duty it would seem to be to perfect it.

Mr. President, I move that this petition, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and I trust that it will receive the early and favorable consideration of that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Joshua Chamberlain have leave to withdraw their petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers relating to the claim of the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Potawatomi Indians, in the State of Michigan. No adverse report has been made, but on the contrary, a favorable report was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I also move that the petition of Preston Starritt, claiming pay which he alleges to be due him as a messenger in the Senate, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to say one word in regard to the motion submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin. I find that when papers are withdrawn from the files of the Senate, the rule is that they shall only be withdrawn when there has been no adverse report. The clerks of the Senate, if they do not find an adverse report written out and with the papers, send down the papers to the committee to which they are referred though there is clearly evidence on the papers that there have been one or more adverse reports. I think that practice should be corrected. I think, if there is anything in the papers that shows the claim has been reported upon adversely, it should not be again referred to a committee without the unanimous consent of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of David Baker and others, owners of the brig Sabao, praying for remuneration for the loss of their vessel destroyed by the rebel steamer Jamestown, at Fortress Monroe, on the 12th of April, 1862, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of J. W. Downey, praying for relief for property sold under the confiscation act, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Selina Barclay, praying for remuneration for the loss of her property caused by the burning of the navy-yard in Portsmouth, Virginia, in April, 1861, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the passage of a law granting a bounty to certain members of the second Minnesota cavalry, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of J. W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh United States infantry, praying that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury may be authorized to credit him for payments of bounty to enlisted men, reported a bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of Jonathan W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh regiment of infantry; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Clara Moore, praying for the payment to her of the amount of the claim of her husband for money paid for additional clerks and office accommodations for those clerks in the register's office, at Leecompton, Douglas county, Kansas, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Larry, praying for compensation for losses sustained by him in the occupation of his property by the United States Army near Cold Harbor, Virginia, in June, 1864, submitted an adverse report thereon.

REGISTERING OF VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No.

204) to regulate the registering of vessels, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and with a recommendation that it pass. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to act upon this bill at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill on the day it is reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear it read first.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no ship or vessel which has been recorded or registered as an American vessel pursuant to law, and which shall have been licensed or otherwise authorized to sail under a foreign flag, and to have the protection of any foreign Government during the existence of the rebellion, shall be deemed or registered as an American vessel, or shall have the rights and privileges of American vessels, except under the provisions of an act of Congress authorizing such registry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer that it should lie over. It is a very important rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lies over under the rule, objection being made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 128) authorizing limited partnerships in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 129) for the relief of the heirs of James Bowden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RECLAMATION OF SWAMP LANDS.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the memorial of Brevet Brigadier General B. S. Roberts, United States Army, setting forth his view of a plan for reclaiming the swamp and waste lands of the lower Mississippi river.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 82) allowing persons having lost one foot and one hand in the naval service of the United States the same pension now allowed to persons having suffered the same loss in the military service;

A bill (H. R. No. 214) for the benefit of Colonel R. E. Bryant;

A bill (H. R. No. 215) for the benefit of John W. Campbell;

A bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Cordelia Murray;

A bill (H. R. No. 217) for the relief of Robert Henne;

A bill (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of Charles Youley; and

A bill (H. R. No. 219) for the relief of Catharine Mock.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 214) for the benefit of Colonel R. E. Bryant—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 215) for the benefit of John W. Campbell—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Cordelia Murray—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 217) for the relief of Robert Henne—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of Charles Youley—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 219) for the relief of Catharine Mock—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 82) allowing persons having lost one foot and one hand in the naval service of the United States the same pension now allowed to persons having suffered the same loss in the military service, was read by its title.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Committee on Pensions have reported a bill precisely identical with this, which has already passed the Senate and been sent to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill will be referred to the Committee on Pensions, if there be no objection.

J. B. RITTENHOUSE.

Mr. NYE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 80. It is a bill of a single section, and will take but a moment to consider it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron, to release him from all accountability for the amount of $18,509, public money, stolen from him on the evening of October 30, 1865, while on duty at Panama, or such portion thereof as he shall fail to recover.

Mr. NYE. I will detain the Senate but a moment with a brief statement of the facts in regard to this bill. Mr. Rittenhouse is the fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron, and is stationed at Panama. On the evening of the 30th of October last, his safe was opened by false keys and $13,500 taken therefrom. He immediately reported the facts to the commanding officer of the squadron, Commander Paulding, and he instituted or organized a board of inquiry to investigate and report upon the facts of the case. They did so fully, which proceedings and findings are to be found in the printed report accompanying the bill. The board of inquiry found that the paymaster was entirely excusable from any fault of the robbery. Subsequent to that time a boy that he had in his employ made the following confession with regard to the manner in which the money was stolen:

Confession of Fritz D. D. Icke, 16th December, 1865.

Fritz D. D. Icke, being sworn, deposed as follows: Know a man by the name of Mark Bradley, and have been in the habit of going to his saloon. He keeps a bar-room in the lower part of the town, near the eastern gate. He asked me to get an impression of the key of Fleet Paymaster J. B. Rittenhouse's safe. He told me to take a piece of paper and press the key upon it. I took the impression in this way, and gave it to Bradley, who made a key of iron, which I saw him do. One day, the paymaster told me to get a bottle of wine from a chest within the adjoining room, and gave me the key of this chest, which was attached to a bundle of keys, among which was the safe key. I then took the impression of the safe key. I took the impression while I was in the adjoining room.

Question. Did Bradley ask you to do this?
Answer. Yes, sir. He said he would give me some of the money. He told me he wanted the impression of the safe key so that he could get into the safe. Did not know how much money was in the safe. Bradley gave me seven dollars after the robbery, at different times. I saw Bradley down town on the afternoon of the 30th of October, and he asked me if there was a lot of money in the safe. I told him yes. Bradley did not come here himself to get the money, but gave the key to a man called Ned, who was at Bradley's place, and who knew all about the matter. Ned came here at about seven o'clock in the evening, while I was here alone, and gave me the key. I opened the safe, and Ned took out the money and carried it away in a basket. Ned was a small, sickly looking man.

Question. Did Foster have anything to do with the robbery?

Answer. No, sir; he had nothing to do with it. Bradley made the key, and Ned came and got the money. I opened the safe for him, and locked it again, giving him the key, which he took away. Ned promised me about three thousand or three thousand five hundred dollars, but said that Bradley would not give me more than four or five hundred dollars. Don't know whether or not the money is still at Bradley's. Four or five days before the robbery, Bradley asked me whether or not there was much money in the safe. I told him I thought not, but that there probably would be more at the end of the month. After Bradley made the key, he gave it to me one day to see if it would fit. I tried it, and found that it opened the safe, and then returned it to him.

LEONARD PAULDING,

Lieutenant Commander, Senior Officer.

SOMERSET ROBINSON,

Surgeon, United States Navy.

WILLIAM B. LITTLE,

United States Consul.

JUAN JOSE DIAZ,

E. DILLINGHAM,

Fleet Paymaster's Clerk.

Subsequent to this time $5,260 in gold was found secreted behind a clock belonging to Bradley. A full investigation of this matter led the committee to which it was referred to the conclusion that this bill ought to pass. It provides that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury shall relieve this paymaster from accounting for such portion of the money as he does not find. The report of the facts also shows that he is a man who has been long in the employ of the Government, and has been a most faithful and reliable officer in all positions in which he has been placed. I hope, therefore, that the bill will be passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to ask the Senator from Nevada if the paymaster did not appoint this clerk who seems to have been in collusion with the robber.

Mr. NYE. No, sir; he was a boy that Commander Paulding sent to assist him from a ship lying in the harbor.

Mr. SHERMAN. This clerk, then, was not appointed by the paymaster?

Mr. NYE. No, sir; he was sent to him from the receiving ship in the harbor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Had he any power or control over him?

Mr. NYE. No, sir; he was a mere servant.

Mr. NESMITH. I will ask the Senator from Nevada if there is a printed report in this case.

Mr. NYE. There is a very full report accompanying the bill. I have stated the substance of it. I will state to the Senators from Ohio and Oregon that this is a case where there is clearly not the least blame to be attached to the paymaster. It was fully investigated before the Committee on Naval Affairs. The character of the man is certified to by various other persons as being of the highest probity.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand from the Senator from Nevada that this money was lost by the fleet paymaster without any fault of his own; that his safe was entered by a robber and his money taken away, and that he has recovered only a small portion of it since the robbery was committed. I have not read the whole report of the case, but from what I have read, it seems to me it is a case in which relief ought to be granted.

Mr. NESMITH. I have not yet obtained the report, and I would prefer that the bill should lie over until time can be had to make an examination of it. I know that at the last session of Congress a similar bill was passed here, and it struck me at the time that it was opening a very wide door for frauds to reimburse men who had lost money and were legally responsible for the custody of it. While I have not made up my mind on this bill, I prefer that it should lie over until I can have an opportunity to examine it more particularly.

Mr. NYE. I will state that on the morning the money was lost Mr. Rittenhouse immediately reported the fact to Commander Paulding, the senior officer upon that station, who, on that very day, convened a board of inquiry to examine into the matter, and they made a most thorough and perfect examination. On the very day that the money was ascertained to be lost, the paymaster himself issued a reward of $5,000 for its recovery. The report likewise shows that he immediately started a man for California, where this boy said the robber had gone, at his own expense, to arrest the principal in the robbery. I understand that he has not been able to make the arrest; but from all the investigation of the Department itself, and from all the papers contained in this report, it is a case where there could not have been the least possible fault in the paymaster. He used all the means for keeping this money that the Government furnished him with. The impression of the key was taken unbeknown to him. In that way this loss occurred. Five thousand two hundred and sixty dollars of the money has been recovered.

Mr. COWAN. Does this bill come from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. NYE. It comes from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who have investigated it and reported unanimously in favor of it. If the Senator desires further examination, I cannot see any necessity for it.

Mr. COWAN. Other cases of this kind have always been considered by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no controversy as to the facts of this case. There is no doubt that the money was lost, and there is no doubt that it was lost without any dereliction, malfeasance, nonfeasance, or misfeasance on the part of Paymaster Rittenhouse. A board was immediately authorized by the commanding officer at that station to investigate the subject, a mixed board, composed of naval officers of the line and of the staff, and the chief of police at Panama, and they have thus reported. Since that report was made, a part of the money has been discovered where it was secreted, going to confirm the correctness of the conclusion to which this mixed board arrived. Paymaster Rittenhouse used all the means for the safety of the money intrusted to him that it was possible for him to use. It seems to me there could not be a clearer case.

The Senator from Ohio seemed to be under a misapprehension in supposing that it was the clerk of the paymaster who was in collusion with the robbers. If so, that would be a strong point against Paymaster Rittenhouse; but it was not the clerk, it was a watchman, a man who had been detailed from one of the ships in the harbor, belonging to the crew of the vessel, to serve in the capacity of watchman at the headquarters on shore, and the testimony goes to show that he was rather a simple-minded young man. If there was anything improper or any neglect on the part of Paymaster Rittenhouse, it was that when he discovered that this young man was not a very smart and intelligent lad, he did not apply to the commander of the vessel to have him discharged; but I do not know that he reached the conclusion that I have, that he was not an intelligent lad. It seems to me that there could not be a more equitable case presented for the consideration of Congress than this.

Mr. COWAN. My objection is that it is simply equitable. It is perfectly clear there is no legal obligation resting on the Government to pay claims of this kind, and it seems to me to be a very doubtful policy for us now to adopt to pay equitable claims when we are refusing legal claims by the million. Why should we? What more merit has one of these officers who has been robbed in this way than those people whose property has been swept away in battle for the life of the Republic? They cannot be paid. I understand the Departments now refuse to recognize any claim unless it is based upon a contract, whereas other claims where property has been taken for public use have just as much legal force and validity if it was taken in an emergency as if it was taken upon a contract, and if we cannot pay legal contracts I think we ought to hesitate a good while before paying these equitable claims.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I think the principle upon which our legislation has proceeded heretofore in such cases has been about this: the Government has reimbursed two or three disbursing officers for losses by fire and captures by the enemy. In no other cases, I think, have the Government reimbursed these losses by their disbursing agents. At the last session of Congress there was a case presented from the State of New York where a paymaster, in receiving money from the teller of a bank, was robbed at the counter of the bank, and there was very great uncertainty in the proof as to whether the money had ever passed or not. That is the only case that I remember in which a law has been passed similar to the one now asked for. There it was very doubtful; and the preponderance of proof seemed to be that the money had never passed into the hand of the paymaster. The moment the money, or draft, or requisition passes into his hands, it becomes his money, and its proper disbursement is secured by bonds that are taken by the Government. If we establish the precedent here of making good the loss to this man for stolen property, it may have the effect to lessen the vigilance of these officers in the custody of public property. I know nothing of this case, and of course take the facts precisely as reported, that this paymaster was robbed without any fault on his part, and that he is an honest and faithful officer; but granting all these things, I think the Government cannot step in and become the guarantor for the safe custody of money in the hands of its disbursing agents.

A few days since a much stronger case than this was presented from the pension agent in the city of New York, and referred to the Committee on Pensions. In that case he claimed that he was robbed; he pursued the robber to Albany, and upon full proof had him convicted and sent to the penitentiary for five years; but we supposed, the money being his own the moment it was drawn, and not belonging to the Government, that he, like every other individual, was responsible for his own losses. The Senate will perceive very readily that although this case may be perfectly honest in every feature of it, still if you adopt the principle of making good to the loser all such losses, you may invite collusion between an unfaithful officer and dishonest accomplices. I do not believe that such legislation should be entered upon at this time.

Mr. CLARK. This is not new legislation, as the Senator from Indiana supposes.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It is during my experience, since I have been in the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot undertake to account for the Senator's experience, but it is not new to many of us here, and certainly not new in the experience of the Committee on Claims. The paymaster is the Government's officer. The Government intrust to him the funds of the Government for a specific purpose, and all that has been required of the paymaster is, to guard the money faithfully with the means that are placed at his disposal, and to see it correctly disbursed. It has been the practice of the Government, where an officer of that kind has been robbed or has lost money without any fault of his own, and the Government are satisfied there is no collusion and he has done everything that he could do to protect and keep the money safely, to reimburse him and relieve him from the obligation. It is not understood to be his money, so that he is liable at all hazards. It is very true, the Government may not relieve him unless they choose; but you will recollect, Mr. President, and the Senator from Indiana, I think, will recollect, that we relieved all the paymasters in the case of a steamer where the money was burned.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Certainly, I said so.

Mr. CLARK. But in that case the money was just as much the money of the paymasters as in this case. It had passed into the hands of the paymaster; and if they are to be charged with the money as their own money, there should have been no more relief in that case than in this. If they misappropriate the money, they are liable to punishment. But there is, as the Senator supposes, danger of collusion. Take the very case in hand. Suppose that this paymaster if he had chosen, or if it was in his mind so to do, had colluded with this watchman to take an impression of that key and give it to a third man to steal that money for a consideration to him.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question right here?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is there any evidence showing how the impression of the key was procured?

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir; the boy says the paymaster gave him the bunch of keys to get something from a chest in an adjoining room, and then he took an impression of the key with paper.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot say what the facts are in this case, because it is a case I have not examined. I am speaking as to the principles which govern this case. There is sometimes great difficulty in ascertaining whether the officer has not colluded with the person committing the robbery, and hence it becomes very necessary for the committee to examine that portion of the case very strictly. I do not know what has been done in this case. I do not know whether this man kept his safe where he ought to have kept it, or whether he kept it in the best place with the utmost care.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state that in this case the paymaster was required by order of the Navy Department to keep his headquarters at Panama. The headquarters building was furnished to him. This safe itself was furnished to him, and the man who was required to protect it as a guard was furnished to him by the Government.

Mr. CLARK. I am only speaking of the necessity of very great carefulness in examining testimony on a point of that kind. I have in my mind now a case similar to this where an officer in our Army during the war with Mexico had his safe broken open, and he was finally relieved by the Government. It did not appear at first that he had used all the diligence and care that he ought to have done in keeping his safe, but finally the Government relieved him. There are numerous such cases. If the committee are satisfied that the man kept the money with all the care that could be required of him, and it was lost without any fault of his, then in my judgment the Government should reimburse him.

Mr. WILSON. It may be that this bill is all right; but even if it be right, I do not intend to vote for it. I believe that if it be right and if we pass it, a great deal of wrong will follow after it, and it will be used for that purpose. I think that we had better wait until we have the greater portion of our paymasters' accounts settled and have them discharged before passing such a measure as this. I remember that a year or two ago a paymaster at New Orleans professed to have lost a large amount of money. The robbery was charged upon a black man. He was arrested and tortured until he made a confession. That paymaster came to this city, and came to me with his papers, asking that we should pass a bill to reimburse him. I told him that whether his case was good or not, he must wait until the war was over; that we had better not, as a matter of policy, enter upon any of these payments now, or the effect would be to make the officers careless and dishonest, and make them collude with others, and the Government would lose thousands of dollars by it, and I should vote for no case whatever while the war lasted. He went away, and within one week was arrested, imprisoned in this city for robbing himself, was tried, convicted, and is now in the penitentiary. The poor man that he tortured until he made him make a confession to avoid further punishment was sent to the Dry Tortugas.

That is the case of one paymaster, and we do not know how many others may collude with dishonest persons. This man can wait. Let this claim and all others of the same kind lie over until we discharge most of the paymasters, who have had over a thousand million dollars intrusted to them in the Army, and which they have paid out, and they close up their accounts. Some of us feared that many paymasters would never be able to make up their accounts, and the Government would lose millions of dollars. We lost in the war of 1812 over two million dollars by paymasters. In this war, although we have paid out over a thousand million dollars to the Army, the report of the Paymaster General shows that we have not lost more than a quarter million dollars. I think we ought to hold paymasters to a rigid accountability for the money placed in their hands. We ought not, at any rate, to be in any hurry to relieve any man. It may be an inconvenience to him; but I believe if we pass this bill, although it may be equitable, it will drag along with it many dishonest cases, and may induce men hereafter to rob themselves, or collude with others, or do some dishonest thing. I think this matter had better lie over for the public good. I shall vote against it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know nothing of the facts of this claim; but assuming the facts to be as stated by the honorable member from Nevada, with due respect to my friend from Massachusetts, it appears to me to be a clear case as against the Government. These officers are but the agents of the United States; they have in their hands the money of the United States; and their whole obligation is to take all reasonable or all possible care of the money. There can be nothing clearer than that, as I think; and if we become satisfied in any individual case that all care has been taken, then it seems to me to follow, upon the principle of justice recognized everywhere, that the officer should be indemnified. There is no distinction between the agent of an individual principal and an agent of the Government as the principal. In each case the agent is not to suffer from conducting properly and honestly and with sufficient care the business of his principal. The doctrine laid down by the honorable member from Massachusetts, if pushed to its extent, would be pregnant with very great mischief. The Secretary of the Treasury has the custody of the money of the Government. The Treasurer of the United States has it, perhaps, more immediately in his own hand. The two together have the custody of the whole treasure of the Government. Suppose a man breaks into the Treasury Department and robs the Treasury of bonds or of money. Will the honorable member say that the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasurer is to bear the loss? I should think not. Why not? Only because in a case of that description it would be admitted that both these officers had acted fairly, with proper diligence, with proper care; and if it would be right, if such a case should occur, as to them, that they should be indemnified, why is it not right in relation to a paymaster?

It seems to me, so far from this principle being pregnant with mischief in the end, that the inexorable rules which the honorable member proposes should be adopted would be followed by mischievous consequences. You will not be able to get an honest man, perhaps, to take this office if, after using all possible diligence and he is robbed, he is to be ruined absolutely. Some knave will be anxious to get it, who does not care whether he is ruined or not, who may pocket the money, and who may attempt to satisfy the Congress of the United States that he has been robbed, when, in point of fact, he has not. But in the case of an honest paymaster—and this man is supposed to be honest—nobody can infer that when he states that he has been robbed he has not been robbed, but still has the money. I understand the committee say every possible diligence was taken that could be taken. I submit it is a clear obligation on the part of the United States to indemnify the officer.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

Several SENATORS. Let the bill go over.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection to the consideration of this case being postponed, but I want to make a suggestion or two in answer to what was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that a man who has a claim against the Government must wait or may wait, and that he would not vote for this claim even if he believed it to be right. I understand him to put it upon that ground. I want the Senate to consider for a moment what that ground is. Take the case of a man who is admitted to have an honest claim against the Government, a claim which the Government ought to pay. The Senator says let it go over. Now, I submit to the Senate that if the Government ought to pay it, it ought to pay it now, and the obligation to pay it now is as strong as it is to pay it at all, and it is as much bound to do it. The Government is strong; the Government has the means of discharging the obligation, and perhaps this poor man, or some other poor claimant, is very much embarrassed and suffers great hardship and wrong by the delay of the Government. What I insist upon is, that you should examine the claim, and if you are convinced it is meritorious, you should pay it; if it is not meritorious, reject it; but do not postpone the man from term to term until weary with coming here he gives up in despair and leaves you to enjoy what you ought to pay him. Why, sir, this is but repudiation in the beginning. If any merchant or any honorable man should so conduct himself with claims against him, and, admitting them to be honestly due, should postpone them from time to time, he would most assuredly lose his credit, as he would deserve to do. The difficulties may be thick around this Government and its responsibilities large, but I am for meeting them now as far as we can and looking them in the face, and adjudicating upon them, without postponing them.

I have no objection to this bill going over for further consideration. I have no objection to every Senator examining the claim from the beginning to the end with the most scrutinizing care. I would, in a case like this, require very thorough evidence. I would require evidence that the paymaster was a man of such high character that he could not be believed to be concerned in an operation of this kind. I admit that cases may arise such as have been mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts, but that does not disturb the great principle that when you come to the conclusion a man ought to be paid, you should pay him. It is no answer to me when I have a claim, that B had a dishonest one which the Government paid. The question is about my claim, whether that should be paid; and if I establish a good claim against the Government, they should not claim to relieve themselves by saying that B had a dishonest one. I know there are many men who would sponge on the Government. There are men who would have coined the blood of the soldiers into dollars if they could; but let the Government be just, let it be honest, and let it secure the affections of the people by its justice and its honesty.

Mr. NESMITH. Every dollar of money wrung from the earnings of the people to carry on this great Government has to be intrusted to the custody of some person, and the safeguards for the protection of the public funds and the proper custody and disbursement of those funds cannot be too great. Men seek these offices and all the security the Government can take is their bonds. I do not say there are not cases where I would vote for the relief of an officer, where he had lost money under circumstances where he had used all diligence for its protection, where it had been destroyed by fire or captured by the public enemy. Those are cases where relief should be granted; but before I would vote for the relief of an officer who had been robbed or had money stolen from him, I must have the most clear and incontrovertible evidence of it. Upon any other hypothesis you would throw the door open to the most illimitable robberies, and I apprehend in the settlement of the public accounts there will hardly be an officer who is a defaulter but will concoct some sort of a story about having been robbed.

Now, sir, this case, from the brief examination that I have been able to give the report, does not come under the category which I have laid down. I will read one sentence from the letter from Commander Paulding, which, I think, shows conclusively that this paymaster did not use due diligence. He says:

"It seems that one day Paymaster Rittenhouse wished him"—

That is, the boy who helped to steal this money—

"to take something from a locker in the next room, taking the bunch of keys from his neck and pointing out the one which fitted the locker; the boy, who had been previously instructed by this man Bradley, took a small piece of writing paper, wetted it with his tongue and took the impression of the wards of the key of the safe; he gave Bradley this impression, and saw him make the key out of a piece of iron."

Here is a case where a custodian of the public money having locked it in a safe, parted with the possession of the key of that safe, and put it in the hands of an irresponsible party who subsequently turns out to be a thief. I do not think that any officer who is disbursing public money and acting with a due regard for the interests of the Government can take risks of that kind. He might as well go off and leave his safe open, if he is going to put his key into the possession of every irresponsible person who wants possession of it. Under the circumstances, with this paragraph in Commander Paulding's letter, it is a case where no sort of diligence was exercised, and if we can grant relief in this case we can grant relief where a man absolutely and intentionally puts his keys in the hands of a person with the intention to rob him. I do not say that this paymaster had any collusion with this party, but I do say that he manifested a disregard of the public interest, by permitting the key of his safe to go into the hands of an irresponsible person, which should make him responsible for the amount of money lost.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I gave notice a few days since, that on this Monday morning I would ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution, reported from the committee on reconstruction, so called; and as I understand that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] designs to speak upon the resolution, and is prepared to do so, and it was generally understood that he would do so to-day, I shall make the motion, although perhaps under other circumstances I would not do it, owing to my own condition. I will, therefore, move that the further consideration of the bill now before the Senate be postponed, with a view to proceed to the consideration of that joint resolution.

Mr. STEWART. I have been waiting for a long time to get an opportunity to call up Senate bill No. 74 for the admission of Colorado. I think that the Senate ought to act upon that subject speedily. Before we enter upon the consideration of a subject that is going to occupy a very long time, and will be discussed here probably for weeks, I think we should give some consideration to this question of the admission of Colorado. It will take but a very short time, I apprehend. It is due to those people that the question should be determined speedily, that they may know what the Senate are disposed to do upon the subject.

Mr. FOOT. That will be debated at length when it is taken up.

Mr. WILSON. You cannot do anything with that to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Maine designate which of the two joint resolutions he asks the Senate to take up?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The one that came from the House of Representatives last week.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the following joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved, &c. (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE — Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Mr. SUMNER addressed the Senate, but without concluding gave way to

Mr. MORGAN, on whose motion the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 5, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NEWELL. My colleague, Mr. WRIGHT, is very sick, and I ask that he be excused from attending the House until sufficiently recovered to do so.

There being no objection, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. WRIGHT.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the States and Territories for bills on leave, to be referred to the appropriate committees without debate, not to be brought back by motions to reconsider, commencing with the State of Maine.

SPECIAL CENSUS.

Mr. BLAINE introduced a bill providing for a special enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States prior to October 1, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill to amend an act amending the act establishing a court for the investigation of claims against the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PENNSYLVANIA INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill to exempt from taxation the Pennsylvania Institution for the Instruction of the Blind; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. MERCUR introduced a bill to amend an act to incorporate the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CATHARINE SHISLS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill authorizing the Quartermaster General to settle the claim of Catharine Shisls, of Washington county, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

TWO BROTHERS, OF WALLACEBURG.

Mr. HOLMES introduced a bill authorizing the issue of an American register to the schooner Two Brothers, of Wallaceburg; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RICE M. BROWN.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill for the relief of Rice M. Brown; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDEMNITY ACT.

Mr. McKEE. I ask to have this bill, being a bill to amend the act of indemnity, approved March 3, 1863, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I would ask my colleague if this is the same bill he desired to introduce the other day.

Mr. McKEE. It is.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Is it in order for me to move to reject the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman has the right to object to its introduction, when the question of granting leave must be acted on without debate. The Clerk will report the bill, after which, if there is objection, the question will be taken upon granting leave for its introduction and reference at this time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that in any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, which has been or shall be commenced in any State court, against any officer, civil or military, or against any other person for any arrest or imprisonment made, or any other trespass done or committed, during the time of the rebellion, the defendant may file a petition to remove the cause for trial in the United States Court of Claims; and upon affidavit that the arrest, imprisonment, or trespass was made or committed by him as an officer of the United States in pursuance of orders from his superior officer which he was bound to obey, and at a time when the rebel forces had invaded or were about to invade the place where the arrest was made, and that he had cause to believe that the person or persons arrested if left at large would impede the operation of the United States forces, and that the arrest was reported to his superior officer, who approved and sanctioned the arrest, and the party arrested was received from his hands by officers of the United States, and held by them with the knowledge and approval of the Secretary of War and the President of the United States, as he believes, it shall be the duty of the State court to proceed no further in the cause, but to dismiss the same and strike it from the docket, and make proper orders for its transfer and removal to the United States Court of Claims, where the cause shall be filed and disposed of as are other claims against the United States; and upon the plaintiff showing undoubted loyalty, and that his arrest and imprisonment was made without reasonable or proper cause, the court shall assess an amount in damages in his favor which shall be paid as other claims out of the Treasury of the United States.

Section two provides that it shall be lawful in any such suit or prosecution for either party to move the transfer of the same by appeal or writ of error to the circuit court of the United States, and thence to the Supreme Court of the United States, whenever the State court shall have decided the motion for the removal of the cause for trial, as prescribed in the first section.

Section three provides that upon the filing of a copy of the record made in the State court in the suit or prosecution described in this act down to and inclusive of the judgment of the court upon the motion for removal, it shall be the duty of the United States circuit court to cause the removal or transfer of the suit or prosecution, with all the papers connected therewith, by mandamus or such other order as may be necessary to effect the removal aforesaid.

Section four provides that in all cases where judgment has been obtained against any party described in the first section, upon the party filing a record of the act upon which the judgment was obtained, with an affidavit setting forth the facts as herein provided, in the circuit court of the United States, it shall be the duty of the circuit court, by supersedeas or such other order as may be necessary, to stay all proceedings which may be commenced or authorized to be commenced by reason of any judgment in the State court; and any officer of any State court who shall refuse to obey or comply with any order from the United States court shall be subject to a penalty of a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or imprisonment not more than three years, or both, in the discretion of the court, the proceedings against the officer disregarding the order to be held in the court from which the order may issue.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule under which the House is now acting.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"On each Monday succeeding that upon which a call for reports takes place as above, it is made the duty of the Speaker to call the States and Territories first for bills on leave for reference only and without debate, and not to be brought back by motions to reconsider."

The SPEAKER. The general usage of the House has been on each alternate Monday to receive all bills presented and refer them to their appropriate committees under the injunction that they are not to be brought back by motions to reconsider. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] objects to the introduction of the bill of his colleague, [Mr. McKee.] And the language of the rule is such that in the opinion of the Chair the gentleman has the right to make the objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask if that does not change the entire spirit and object of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does; but the language of the rule is, "bills on leave."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then, if any gentleman objects to the introduction of any bill, it can only be done by a majority vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. This is the first time the question has arisen in the House under this rule, or during the Speaker's service in the House, that he can remember; but the Chair is of opinion that according to the language of this rule, if objection is made by any gentleman to the introduction of any bill he must have leave granted by a vote of a majority of the House, which must be taken without debate.

Mr. McKee. I call for the yeas and nays on the question of granting me leave to introduce this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 14, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, De los R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Hendon W. Clarke, Cobb, Cullom, Dawes, DeForest, Deeming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Hale, Honor C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Dennis Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketchum, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, McRehnd, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stillwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Arnam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Boyer, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, McCullough, Niblack, Noel, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Sitgreaves, Strouse, and Trimble—14.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Bergen, Bidwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Denison, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Le Blond, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Nicholson, Radford, Ross, Schenck, Seefeld, Shanklin, Sloan, Stevens, Taber, Taylor, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Welker, Winfield, and Wright—52.

So leave was granted for the introduction of the bill.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EZEKIEL P. MULFORD.

REMOVAL OF DEAD BODIES.

Mr. WARD introduced a bill to punish for the removal of dead bodies from graves and other places of interment in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand several applications for the payment of claims for damages, and as they all refer to one another, I ask to present and refer them en masse.

The SPEAKER. Only bills and joint resolutions are now in order; and the business after that is the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Illinois.

INFORMERS UNDER INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to this House repealing such provisions of the internal revenue law as allow informers to receive a moiety of fines for an infraction of that law.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to modify it so as to make it a resolution to inquire into the expediency.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is a very simple question, and I would like to get an expression of the House upon the instruction.

Mr. MORRILL. It ought not to be acted upon without consideration.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will change it, but I hope the committee will report soon, and that the House will act upon the subject. It is growing into a monstrous evil throughout the country.

The SPEAKER. If it gives rise to debate it goes over.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will modify it and make it a resolution of inquiry.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

WHITE MAN'S DAY.

Mr. ROSS. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question upon it:

Whereas two months of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress have expired, and but little progress been made in perfecting and maturing the important public measures so anxiously hoped for and expected by our constituents; and whereas a large portion of our time has been devoted to legislation for and in behalf of freedom: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a new rule for the government of the House, to the effect that one day in each week be set apart by the Speaker of the House to be exclusively devoted to the public business of the country, and that during this Congress it be known as and called the "white man's day."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LEVYING CONTRIBUTIONS ON SECEDING STATES.

Mr. McCLURG offered the following resolution:

Whereas it is clearly manifest that the continued contumacy in the seceding States renders it necessary to exercise congressional legislation in order to give to the loyal citizens of those States protection in their natural and personal rights enumerated in the Constitution of the United States, and in addition thereto makes it necessary to keep on foot a large standing army to maintain the authority of the national Government and to keep the peace; and whereas the country is already overburdened by a war debt incurred to defend the nation against an infamous rebellion, and it is neither just nor politic to inflict this vast additional expense on the peaceful industry of the nation: Therefore,

Resolved, That it be referred to the joint committee of the Senate and House to inquire into the expediency of levying contributions on the seceding States to defray the extraordinary expenses that would otherwise be imposed on the General Government, and that said committee be instructed to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. KERR. I move to lay the resolution on the table, and on that I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the resolution, no quorum voted.

Tellers were then ordered; and Messrs. McClurg and Kerr were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 65.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then it goes over under the rule.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ANDERSON introduced a joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. BLOW. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question upon it:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire and report upon the expediency of authorizing the employment of colored troops, with their consent, in the construction of railroads in the departments or districts where they may be stationed.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House (H. R. No. 143) entitled "An act for the relief of Charles F. Anderson."

HARBOR OF ST. JOSEPH, MICHIGAN.

Mr. UPSON introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to assist in the improvement of the harbor of St. Joseph, Michigan.

WIDOWS OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Mr. UPSON also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary or appropriate for the aid and benefit of the surviving widows of soldiers of the Revolution, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ENROLLMENT SURGEONS' REPORTS.

Mr. LONGYEAR submitted the following resolution:

Whereas the reports of the surgeons of the boards of enrollment during the late war now on file in the Provost Marshal General's Bureau have been collected at great expense, and contain much information valuable to the world generally, and to the Government particularly, in any future emergency:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of the compilation and publication of the said reports, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SCHENCK. That matter has already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was agreed to.

LOCATION OF THE CAPITAL.

Mr. DRIGGS introduced a joint resolution referring the subject of the permanent location of the capital of the United States to the joint committee on reconstruction; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the removal of and permanent location of the capital of the United States is a subject of great importance, and one which is sure to be demanded in the future on account of the increasing population of the great West; and whereas twenty odd States have been added to the Union since the location of its capital here, rendering its present site entirely out of the geographical and business center of the States, as well as of the inhabitants thereof; and whereas we consider that all wise legislation should look as well to the interest of the future millions who are to inhabit the undeveloped portion of our country as to the present day and hour; and whereas we believe it is justly due to the interest and convenience of the great majority of the people of the States who have always been loyal and true to the Government that their capital should be located in a central position where it will be secure against future attacks and destruction by foreign enemies, and where their Representatives can legislate for the enfranchisement of citizens, or pass such other laws as may be deemed proper without incurring menacing threats from its surrounding inhabitants; and whereas those who are opposed to a change freely admit that the removal of the capital is only a question of time, and in view of the possibility, not to say probability of such an event, we consider it unwise and imprudent to spend any more money upon public works in the District than to complete such as have been commenced until the question is definitely settled: Therefore,

Resolved, (the Senate concurring), That the joint committee on reconstruction be directed to take the subject under consideration, and report to Congress by bill or otherwise for such action as may be thought proper regarding the removal or permanent retention of the capital of the United States in the District of Columbia.

Resolved, That the committee have leave to report either during the present or next session of Congress.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope there will be no objection to that resolution.

Mr. DRIGGS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

PAVING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. McINDOE submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of paving Pennsylvania avenue with the Nicholson pavement, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not want any such instruction given to the committee. I hope the resolution will be voted down. The resolution was rejected.

VINDICATION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that a bill now on the Speaker's table, being Senate bill No. 61, to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication, be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed.

No objection was made.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF JOINT COMMITTEE.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask to have taken from the Speaker's table a Senate joint resolution making an appropriation for the expenses of the joint committee on reconstruction. It is necessary to have prompt action on that resolution in order that the fees of witnesses and other expenses of the committee may be paid.

The title of the resolution was read, being Senate joint resolution No. 26, for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Would it be in order for me now to move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I submit that motion. The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the first business on the Speaker's table was the concurring in the Senate amendments to House bill No. 86, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

The first amendment was to strike out the word "per" and insert the words "as provided for by;" so that the clause will read:

For revolutionary pensions, and pensions of widows, children, mothers, and sisters of soldiers, as provided for by acts of March 18, 1818, &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to insert after the words "1862" the words "and for compensation to pension agents and expenses of agencies."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to be informed of the effect of this amendment. What necessity is there for changing the existing law in this respect? And I would ask if it is proposed to give those agents any additional compensation?

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that this adds nothing to their compensation; it only makes it more specific.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to have that clause read as it is proposed to amend it.

It was read, as follows:

For revolutionary pensions, and pensions of widows, children, mothers, and sisters of soldiers, per act of March 18, 1818; May 15, 1828; June 7, 1842; July 4, 1836; July 7, 1838; March 3, 1843; June 17, 1841; February 2; July 21, and July 29, 1848; February 3, 1853; June 3, 1858; and July 14, 1862, and for compensation to pension agents and expenses of agencies, $9,800,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to ask if the appropriation remains the same.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; but whether a construction can be given to the law, as now proposed to be amended, which will allow any compensation in addition to what has heretofore been given by existing laws.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand it will not have that effect.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not had time to examine this bill. But I will ask the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] as he seems to have examined the bill, whether there is any thing in it providing that national banks shall act as pension agents, in order to relieve the country from that heavy expenditure. I think there ought to be some provision made in some of these pension bills that the national banks shall incur the expenses now incurred by the pension agencies for the payment of pensions, &c. These banks are deriving great advantages from the Government, and they ought to incur these expenditures. We were promised in the last Congress that some provision of this sort should be made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is nothing of that kind in this bill. And however favorable I might be to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] I should oppose it in this bill as being independent legislation in an appropriation bill, which the gentleman agrees with me should be kept cut of such bills.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

For revolutionary pensions and pensions of widows, children, mothers, and sisters of soldiers, as provided for by acts of March 18, 1818; May 15, 1828; June 7, 1832; July 4, 1836; July 7, 1838; March 3, 1843; June 7, 1844; February 2, July 21, and July 29, 1848; February 3, 1853; June 3, 1855, and July 4, 1862, $2,500,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was as follows:

To insert after the words "July 14, 1862," the words "to be paid out of the Navy pension fund; so that the same will read:

Nor Navy pensions to widows, children, mothers and sisters, per act of August 11, 1848, and July 14, 1862, to be paid out of the Navy pension fund, $140,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to amend the title by adding the words "and additional appropriations for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the votes by which the House concurred in the several amendments of the Senate; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MADISON'S WRITINGS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 17, directing the distribution of the writings of James Madison.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

It directs the Joint Committee on the Library to distribute by mail or otherwise the five hundred copies of the writings of James Madison, published by authority of Congress, as follows: to the President of the United States, one copy; to the libraries of the different Executive Departments and of the Postmaster General and Attorney General, one copy each; to each member of the present Senate and House of Representatives, one copy; to the Library of Congress, ten copies; to the libraries of the several States and Territories of the Union, one copy each; to such public and college libraries as may be designated by the present Joint Committee on the Library, one hundred copies; the residue to be retained in the Department of the Interior for future distribution.

Mr. STEVENS moved to refer the joint resolution to the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope we shall not proceed to vote ourselves books at this early period of the session. I move that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my motion for the present, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] may explain this matter.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire simply to state that this resolution has been before the Joint Committee on the Library, having been examined by that committee before its passage in the Senate. It provides, not for the purchase of any books, but simply for the distribution of books now on hand.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I would like to inquire of my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] whether these books have been paid for, whether, after the passage of this resolution, we may not be called upon to pay for these documents.

Mr. KELLEY. As I understand, the Government purchased some time ago a certain number of copies of this work, and has them now on hand. This resolution simply provides for the distribution of these documents, which the Government bought and paid for long ago. It does not contemplate the purchase of a single volume.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew the motion that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope that the motion to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Library will be withdrawn, and that the resolution will be passed now.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the motion to refer.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. SCOTFIELD, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Augustus C. Baldwin, claiming to be entitled to the seat now occupied by ROWLAND E. TROWBRIDGE as a Representative from the fifth congressional district of Michigan, submitted a report, accompanied with the following resolution:

Resolved, That ROWLAND E. TROWBRIDGE is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the fifth congressional district of Michigan.

The report and resolution, with the accompanying papers, were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill No. 201. I do not think it will take five minutes to pass it.

Mr. LE BLOND. Does the gentleman wish to call up that bill for action now?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The House is now acting under a suspension of the rules. The bill now in order, the Freedmen's Bureau bill, is a special order, made such under a suspension of the rules.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to trouble this House with any remarks after the very able remarks of my colleagues from Kentucky and others in opposition to the bill. But when I consider the magnitude of the principles involved in this measure, I feel it my duty to enter my solemn protest against it and to present my views in relation to the measure.

I feel I would be recreant to the cause of both white and black who are to be operated upon by this bill.

Sir, it will not be my purpose on this occasion to deal in denunciations, criminations, or recriminations. I shall endeavor not to appeal to the passions of any one section of this country for the purpose of arousing their prejudices against the inhabitants of another. I shall not attempt either to appeal to the prejudices which may exist in the minds of any one in this country against either white or black. Unfortunately for our beloved country too much of that spirit has been indulged in from one end of the country to another. My effort, sir, shall be to appeal to your patriotism, to your love of country, of justice, and fairness, from one end of this now divided country to the other.

Mr. Speaker, this bill and its provisions are to operate upon the entire country from ocean to ocean, from the lakes to the Gulf. I propose to enter on the objections I have to this bill, and the constitutional reasons that induce me to vote against it; and I firmly believe those objections are of such character, if they were considered calmly and coolly by this House, it would not receive the sanction of a majority upon this floor. The principle of this bill strikes down, in my judgment, the foundations upon which civil liberty rests, and obliterates the Constitution and the rights of citizens in the States and individuals under that Constitution. Under the provisions of the bill no man, white or black, when those provisions are brought into successful operation, can feel that he is an American citizen and entitled to the protection which the laws of the land afford to him.

It has been the boast, sir, of this country that this land was to be the asylum for the oppressed of every nation and every clime. Let that remain the boast and pride of this country. Let us not by our own acts, let us not by our own laws, strike down the liberties of white and black under the provisions of this bill. Let us hold this land out as the asylum for the oppressed everywhere; let us still invite them to our shores; and let us protect them in all their rights under the Constitution of our fathers.

Under the provisions of this act land is to be taken, farms are to be opened, and all branches of industry are to be operated upon. Where is the warrant for this? Where is the authority under the Constitution for such a power to buy and take land, to distribute land to this unfortunate class of the people? Where is the authority and warrant in the Constitution for that purpose? I have read that Constitution in vain to find the shadow of authority for the passage of a bill with such extraordinary powers as these. It is in plain and open violation of that section in the Constitution of the United States that provides that no bill of attainder shall be passed by Congress. It is in plain and open violation of that provision which declares that Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder for treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained.

I hold this bill is in open and plain violation of that provision of the Constitution. There exists no power in this Government to deprive a citizen of the United States of his property, to take away the hard earnings of his own industry and bestow them upon this class of citizens. The only way you can take property in South Carolina, Georgia, or any other State, is to take that property under the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof. It declares that no bill of attainder shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, longer than the life of the person attained. When you have taken the property of a man convicted of the high crime of treason, when he is dead you have no right to deprive his orphans of that property. This is one of the great safeguards thrown around the people. The people of the United States in the war with the British Crown, learned that to be and to remain free we should adhere to the great truth, the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. We will stand by the great constitutional principle that no power was placed in the hands of any body or party to deprive American citizens of their rights. The Constitution provides that no man's private property shall be taken for public use without first rendering to him just compensation therefor.

Sir, it has been the custom and practice of this Government when they desired to establish navy-yards and arsenals in any of the States to obtain the consent of those States, and for those States to yield to the Federal Government exclusive authority over such property. But this bill not only proposes to make the Government a great land-owner, but to build school-houses, establish colleges, and to inaugurate a system of machinery that will involve this country in millions and millions of liability, when I think that every consideration should appeal to us to-day to economize, to save, as far as in our power lies, the masses of this country that are now tax-ridden from any additional taxation. This bill not only violates this plain provision of the Constitution that I have read, but it strikes down and obliterates that great writ of habeas corpus that should be the pride and boast of every American freeman from one end of this land to the other, and which should be extended to all under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman if in the State of Kentucky the writ of habeas corpus is not already suspended.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I will answer the gentleman. I know that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended, by an order of the President of the United States, from one end of this country to the other, and that the President, under authority given to him by Congress, had restored that writ to all the States of the Union, excepting, I believe, in his proclamation, the States recently in rebellion, the State of Kentucky, and the District of Columbia. I believe that to be the fact. But, sir, as a question of law, in my humble judgment, the writ of habeas corpus is restored to-day from ocean to ocean and from the Gulf to the lakes, by reason of the fact that we are now in peace. Peace prevails from one end of this land to the other. Nowhere is there a hostile flag or a hostile armed foe.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to ask, then, how it can be asserted that this strikes down anything so long as the gentleman admits that the privileges of the writ are already suspended, unless he wishes to take issue with the President of the United States.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I do not wish to take any issue with the President of the United States, but I thought that I had made myself understood to the gentleman by stating that as a matter of law, in my opinion, that great writ of right was restored to the poorest and humblest man in this broad land, even to my colored friends, if I have any, if the amendment is valid.

Sir, where is the authority for the suspension of the writ? Where does the gentleman and his party derive the authority to suspend it? They derive it from the Constitution of the United States, because the power exists nowhere, not even in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of this Government, except in cases arising out of war, insurrection, and rebellion. The authority is in the Constitution, and there, too, is the limitation. And as soon as war, insurrection, or rebellion ceases, the writ is restored to every citizen in the States. The power to suspend the writ ceases with the termination of the rebellion. Has it not terminated? Is there a jury of intelligent Englishmen or Americans anywhere to be found who would decide upon the facts presented, that we are not at peace to-day and no longer in a state of war?

But while I say this I do not intend to be understood as making any assault upon the President of the United States because he has not restored that writ, for I believe, and I think I know, that Andrew Johnson is too good a lawyer not to know that when the reasons for that suspension shall have passed away, the writ returns by reason of the fact.

Pray, sir, if the war is not ended, how long is it to continue? I know there is a party in the section where I live who would like to have it continue always. There is a party there that desires to make money. I do not speak of the great political party in Kentucky that opposes me. I speak of a party in Kentucky—very small indeed—that regretted from the bottom of their hearts when the war ceased, when General Lee surrendered to the Federal forces. It stopped too soon for their cotton speculations, too soon for them to continue to ply their calling and wring out of the hard earnings of the people of the South, loyal and disloyal, their money, and place it in their own pockets. Sir, there is clamor of this kind in my section of the country, and we should meet facts as they exist. We are at peace; let us so recognize it, and thank God that it is so.

Sir, is there a provision in this bill that gives to the man that shall be arrested under it the right to a trial by jury, the right to appeal to the law, the right to execute bail? None, sir. It places in the power of these agents of the Freedmen's Bureau unlimited and despotic power to fine and imprison, from which, in my judgment, there is no escape; and as a friend of that race about which much has been said here, I would upon this occasion, as upon all others, do justice to them, and see that their rights under the Constitution of the country are respected; but I appeal to you to pause before you pass this bill, if the object and purpose of its passage is to benefit and protect them. In my judgment, such an engine of power has in no instance in the history of the civilized world ever been productive of good to those upon whom it was intended to confer favors. Such power should not be deposited in the hands of anybody, and I would save and protect them from the exercise of such enormous powers.

Sir, that I may be correct in regard to the power of the Government in the suspension of this right, I desire to read from the Constitution:

"The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion and invasion the public safety may require it."

There was a rebellion; but does that prove that rebellion must exist throughout all time? The very moment that rebellion was over, the very moment the insurrection was suppressed, the power existed nowhere to suspend that writ. This bill is in violation of that provision of the Constitution. It is also in violation of this provision of the Constitution of the United States:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

Sir, I would ask whether these agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, numbering, I believe about eighteen hundred, are not judicial officers, with authority to fine $1,000 and imprison one year? Would they not be considered in this country or in any other as exercising judicial powers? A common magistrate, whose jurisdiction is limited to fifty or a hundred dollars, is a judicial officer. By this bill you clothe the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau with power to arrest at his will and pleasure. He is made the sole judge. The great safeguard thrown around the citizen that no man shall be arrested except upon affidavit and information, is stricken down, and the officers of this bureau can arrest the honorable Speaker of this House or anybody else they may find in these States down there, if they, in their judgment, conceive they have violated any of the extraordinary provisions of this bill. They could arrest General Grant or General Sherman, or any of our greatest officers. And, sir, where is there any redress? There is no trial by jury, no right to the writ of habeas corpus, no right to appeal. If there be any provision in the bill which preserves those rights, I would like the honorable chairman of the select committee to point it out.

Sir, I am for peace. I desire to see this country restored. I desire to see legislation here that will be acceptable to the people of this whole country. I desire to see laws that shall operate equally and alike upon all portions of this great country, and that shall shed their benign influence upon all the citizens of this land alike, as the dews of heaven fall alike upon all. Let us have no legislation that is to apply to the people North or to the people South. We are not now at war; we are at peace.

Sir, in addition to the clauses of the Constitution which I have read which this bill violates, in my judgment it strikes down every one of the amendments made to the Constitution of the United States, which I will read. It is in violation of the plain provisions of those amendments. I have looked in vain for any warrant or authority in any one of the articles or sections of this Constitution for the enormous powers conferred by this bill. Nowhere in the Constitution do I find any such warrant or authority.

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

Is not this great safeguard of the people, is not the right of the black man as well as the right of the white man, invaded by this bill, and in violation of that provision of the Constitution?

The Constitution says:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

The Constitution also says:

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation: to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Is there anything in this bill that gives to this poor, unfortunate class of men, or to the white men of the South, these inalienable rights of an American freeman? If they are free, if they are entitled to their freedom under the Constitution of their country, then give it to them, and extend to them the privileges of freedmen, protecting them in the enjoyment of their liberty and their property and the just reward of their own labors; and do not impose upon them such a law as this, with such despots as I fear we will have under it, for the purpose of crushing them out.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman speaks about securing the rights of all parties. I wish to know how he regards that law of Kentucky which makes it a felony for a certain class of people to go into the State, and whether he thinks the Freedmen's Bureau may not properly rectify such a law as that.

Mr. TRIMBLE. So far as any law is concerned that exists in the State of Kentucky, I will say to that gentleman, with all due deference, if he will let Kentucky manage her own affairs she will manage it very much better than anybody here can do it. The people of Kentucky will protect their people in all their rights, if their protection is left to them.

And I will say that there are laws in other States making discriminations and distinctions in regard to this class of persons. There are such laws in Illinois, in Indiana, in Ohio, and in many other States. The law of the State of Illinois makes it a felony for a negro to come into that State. And the law of the State of Indiana also does the same.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will state that that law has been repealed now. It was once the law of Illinois, but the enlightened civilization of the nineteenth century has overridden that barbarism.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Does not the constitution of the State of Illinois to-day prohibit free negroes from coming into that State?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Illinois has repealed all laws in that regard.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Has there been an amended constitution submitted to the people since the commencement of the war?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That was not adopted; it was voted down by the people.

Mr. MARSHALL. It is due to the truth of history that I should say that my colleagues [Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. FARNSWORTH] are mistaken in regard to the constitution of Illinois. The constitution of 1848 provides that the Legislature of Illinois shall pass laws prohibiting negroes coming into that State.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But there is no such law.

Mr. TRIMBLE. My argument was that there was a provision in the constitution of Illinois to that effect.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understood the gentleman to state that there was a law in the State of Illinois making it a felony for a negro to come into that State.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I intended to refer to the constitution of the State of Illinois. If I said "law" it was by mistake, for I had in my mind the fact that the people of Illinois had, by a very large majority, adopted that constitution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All laws upon that subject which have ever been in force in the State of Illinois have been repealed.

Mr. TRIMBLE. If the Legislature of the State of Illinois have not passed laws in accordance with the constitution of the State, that is a question for the people of the State to take cognizance of.

But there are other States that make discriminations, that would place these parties in the condition of felons, if, under the provisions of this bill, they should be brought before one of these jurists who are to be appointed in every county in this country; for the provisions of this bill, as I understand, apply to the whole country, North, South, East, and West. It includes the northern States, every single one of them. There is, I believe, an amendment pending which proposes to limit the operations of the bill to the States lately in rebellion, and the State of Kentucky, with the other border States. But, sir, I trust that partial legislation will not be adopted by the Congress of the United States. What have Kentucky and the other border States done during this controversy that they should be singled out here for class legislation, that they should be made subject to legislation which is calculated to degrade them in their own estimation and in the estimation of every honest man from one end of this country to the other. Sir, Kentucky has stood as a wall of fire between the Government and those men in the South who were endeavoring to overthrow it. The bones of the sons of Kentucky lie upon every battle-field: their blood has crimsoned the soil of every State where the operations of this war have extended. Both armies have marched and countermarched over the fields of Kentucky. She has complied with every requisition of the Federal Government.

Mr. GRINNELL. Inasmuch as the gentleman is eulogizing the patriotism of Kentucky, I wish to ask him whether Kentucky did not, at the opening of the war, declare her "neutrality," and proceed to raise troops and organize an army for her own defense as against the Government, and whether she did not refuse to allow the armies of the Union to cross her soil?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I believe that at one time there was something said there about neutrality; but I believe there has never been a time when in Kentucky, from one end of her borders to the other, a majority of her people have not stood ready to support the Union, the Constitution, and the laws passed under it. There has never been a time when Kentucky has shrunk from her duty to the Constitution and the laws. Notwithstanding all the efforts of the South to precipitate Kentucky into the rebellion, she steadfastly refused to take part in that rebellion and has uniformly stood by the Constitution. In spite of all the efforts of certain parties within her borders, she has maintained her fealty to the Constitution, as she does to-day.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman whether his colleague [Mr. ROUSSEAU] was not during the war obliged to go over into the State of Indiana for the purpose of organizing his regiment?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I believe that my distinguished colleague did raise his regiment and camp upon the opposite side of the river.

Mr. GRINNELL. Because he was obliged to do so.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I say, sir, that, according to my information, the action of Kentucky at that time met with the cordial indorsement of the then Chief Magistrate of the nation.

The men who were raised by General ROUSSEAU were Kentuckians. Kentucky has complied with every requirement that has been made upon her by this Government; and she stands here to-day claiming through her Representatives the same protection and the same rights which are enjoyed by any other loyal State. All I ask for Kentucky I am willing to yield to Massachusetts or any other State. But, sir, I enter my solemn protest against this class legislation, which, instead of bringing peace and harmony to the country, will only tend to embitter the feelings of one section of the country against another.

Sir, I appeal to the gentlemen who are to follow me to show any warrant or authority in the Constitution for the passage of this measure. I ask it. No where can I find it. I was referred the other day by a distinguished gentleman on the opposite side that they obtained it under the provision for the general welfare of the country, and under the provision of the Constitution as recently amended, I believe known as the thirteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, I have looked in vain to that amendment to find a shadow of authority in it for the provisions of this bill. Sir, this bill is in violation of that amendment, made by that party now in power; and I ask if they are not estopped from violating the provisions of their own amendment. That amendment declares—though I have it not now before me—that slavery or involuntary servitude shall never hereafter exist in the United States, except for crime, and then only after due conviction. That is the language of the amendment. Sir, is not this bill in violation of it? Do you not enslave men under this bill, without due conviction, without trial by jury, and without any of the guarantees secured to you and me, and which ought to be secured through all time to the poorest and humblest men in the country. I think, sir, there is no authority in that amendment for this bill.

But they say they have authority under the second section; that that gives Congress the right to pass appropriate legislation. Well, according to all fair and reasonable construction, I think the only authority which can be found in that second section will be to give to Congress the right to carry out the true intent and spirit of the section. They cannot claim under that any other power. What was the object and intent of that? It was to give to these men their freedom. That was the whole purpose of it. That has been understood, and the language of that amendment has been adjudicated upon by the highest tribunals of the land. It is understood. Nothing can be claimed under that second section of the amendment except to give to these people their right to their freedom. Does this bill do it? Does it not deprive them of the right which they were to obtain under this constitutional provision if valid?

It may be, sir, that they claim constitutional authority for this measure upon some one of the amendments now pending in the Houses of Congress, and which have not been acted upon, and which have not, of course, been approved and ratified by the President and the States. It may be that they claim authority under the amendments they propose to make to that instrument.

It was enunciated by the distinguished leader of the Opposition upon this floor that it was not necessary or proper that amendments to the Constitution passed by Congress should be submitted to the President for his approval and signature; that it was entirely a work of supererogation. It may be that gentlemen on that side of the House, in their zeal for constitutional amendments, may come to the conclusion it is not necessary to refer them to the States to be ratified. We are not a constitutional convention; we are here by virtue of the Constitution, sworn to protect and support that instrument, and to exercise under that instrument the privileges and powers delegated to us by the States, not to trespass or trample upon the rights of the States.

We are told that nineteen States are sufficient for the adoption of the amendment. The Constitution declares that every order and resolution requiring the concurrence of the House and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States. Under that provision of the Constitution these amendments must receive the sanction of the President before they can be referred to the States for ratification. Sir, if they have the right to exclude the Executive they have the right to exclude the sanction of the States.

One great reason why I feel so much solicitude in reference to this bill is that it is to operate for weal or woe upon a people who are denied their rights upon this floor, upon a people who, in my judgment, are willing and anxious to conform to any law of Congress passed in pursuance of the Constitution. They are denied this. But we are to legislate for them without their sanction, without their consent. Sir, there is a great principle running through the constitutions of nearly all our States, that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Is there any consent of these people whose interests and rights are to be affected by this bill? None whatever. There is none here to speak for them. No appeal of theirs can be heard.

Sir, I ask you in all justice, in all candor, would it not be better, would it not be in a spirit of harmony, of justice, and of peace, before you pass this measure affecting so vitally the interests of the South, that they should be permitted at least to have seats upon this floor, and that we should hear them? But they are even denied the courtesy which has been extended to contestants through all the past a seat upon this floor.

Sir, there are thousands and thousands of widows and orphans in that section whose husbands and fathers have fallen in defense of the flag of their country, who will be affected, and who will feel the tyranny and oppression of this bill. There is not one in that vast region, in my judgment, who, if this bill goes into operation, will not have cause to regret the day and hour of its passage. The colored race, in my judgment, will have cause to exclaim, "Deliver me from my friends," when the workings of this bureau, as it may be worked under bad men, shall be brought to bear upon them and others.

The only person that I have the pleasure of a personal acquaintance who is connected with this bureau is its distinguished chief, General Howard. For him I have a very great respect. I believe him to be a soldier, a patriot, and a gentleman. But, sir, if even General Howard himself, much as I respect him, was to be placed in my county or my district with these extraordinary and dangerous powers, I, for one, would enter my protest. We cannot expect to obtain a competent class of men scattered over the country under the pay that is proposed, men skilled in the law, in the Constitution, and in a knowledge of the rights of their fellow-citizens, to adjudicate upon these questions. It will probably be reposed in the hands of men who for party, sinister purposes, may use it as agents of that bureau are now using it in the South, to make slaves of these people—the only vestige, I believe, that is left in some of those States of that institution, so far as requiring the services of this people, can be found in some one of the established bureaus down there.

What, sir, is the history of this question? What do we find here to-day? We find the party that is pressing this bill invading the rights of the South, invading the States, invading our homes and our firesides, by officers unknown to the Constitution, and by authorities unwarranted by the Constitution. We find it done by the party which throughout the late terrible civil conflict professed to be for the Constitution and for the Union, and to be fighting to restore that Constitution and Government to its original purity. They professed that whenever there was no longer an enemy in the country the war ought to cease—that it was prosecuted in no spirit of vindictiveness but only to maintain the authority of the Federal Constitution and the laws, declaring all the time that the States were still in this Union and that there was no power by which they could go out; even declaring that any man or any set of men who advocated the doctrine that they could go out of the Union were guilty of a high crime. We find on the other hand Jeff. Davis and his party down South claiming the right to secede from this Union and to set up a government for themselves. And now when the war is over and the power and authority of the Federal Government are exercised from one end of the country to the other, unfortunately for the country these parties have changed sides. Davis and his friends now claim all the rights and privileges under the Constitution; that their States could not go out; that there is nothing but successful rebellion that could take them out. And we now find this party of the North declaring, by their action at least, that the eleven rebel States are out of the Union.

Sir, I cannot change backward and forward to suit these extreme parties. I stand where I stood at the commencement of this conflict when I declared to the people of my State that I did not intend to be driven into secession, did not intend to be driven by this party or the other party from the Constitution—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GRINNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. GRIDER. I ask that the gentleman have a few minutes to finish his speech.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman was only going to occupy half an hour when he began.

Several MEMBERS. Let him go on.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have no objection if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. ELIOT. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was informed, not being here on Saturday, that by arrangement with the Speaker pro tempore the gentleman was to speak but half an hour; but the Chair did not regard that, and allowed the gentleman to occupy an hour.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I will add but a very few remarks.

Mr. ELIOT. I yield for five minutes.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I have thus stated my constitutional objections to this bill, and I think that I am sustained by that instrument in every single point that I make in opposition to it; and I appeal to my friends who love this Union, who love it for all the memories of the past, who love it because it has protected them and theirs; I appeal to them to pause and reflect before they press this measure upon these people: for I tell you that, in my judgment, the effects of the provisions of this bill to us as a nation will not be told in our lifetimes. If legislation of this character is to be pressed here, I awfully fear hope will sink within us. Our love for this Union and desire for its restoration will be greatly weakened and estranged. I earnestly hope that this class of legislation will cease, that crimination and recrimination shall cease, and that all parties shall meet here like brothers standing upon the same broad platform of the Constitution, demanding for each and every section of the country every right they have under that instrument.

Sir, I have no animosity in my heart against South Carolina, or against Maine, or against Massachusetts. I cannot forget Lexington or Bunker Hill, and every right which I claim for Kentucky I would yield to Massachusetts, and I demand it for South Carolina, and those other States that have no voice here to-day, whose country is now desolated from one end to the other, and whose widows and orphans are now appealing to Heaven that they may be protected in this hour of trial. We have a right to demand that laws which operate upon one section of this country shall operate equally upon others. That is all I ask, that is all I demand, and while I live I will claim that right for my State and every other State.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill now under discussion has been carefully considered by the committee on the Freedmen's Bureau, of which I have the honor to be an humble member; and I will say, as preliminary to the remarks which I desire to make, that I have been very much surprised at the course of certain gentlemen representing especially the State of Kentucky. I do not wonder that that State desires to stand well before the country as a patriotic and noble Commonwealth; but I cannot forget when I hear these extravagant claims set up here that her Governor, in the first year of the rebellion, refused to honor the call for troops made by the President of the United States in our darkest hour; nor can I forget that when her soldiers wished to organize regiments they were obliged to cross the Ohio river into the State of Indiana, that they might organize them free from the interference of the power of Kentucky neutrality. That is a fact in history, and I cannot overlook it when gentlemen here arraign the President of the United States because he has seen fit to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in the State of Kentucky.

Sir, I differ with the gentlemen in reference to the course of the President of the United States in that regard. I have a profound admiration for his course in suspending that writ in old Kentucky as well as in South Carolina. I believe it ought to be suspended; that its restoration would bring anarchy and bloodshed. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky who last addressed the House why he has any objections to its being suspended there?

Mr. TRIMBLE. To-day?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, to-day.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Certainly I have. I do not think the Constitution warrants its suspension in any part of the United States, now that the rebellion is at an end.

Mr. GRINNELL. Then the gentleman from Kentucky is opposed to the Attorney General, who is also from the State of Kentucky, and the President of the United States, who is from the State of Tennessee. I hope he will reconcile that with the fact that he is now professedly par excellence one of the friends of the President.

I know this, sir, that men from the northern States doing business in Kentucky are now being indicted and tried by the courts of that State, because they were acting under the military authority of the United States; and there would be no freedom for the loyal people of Kentucky to-day but for the suspension of this writ. And now, gentlemen from that State, five or six of them, are opposing this bureau. They dislike its operation, the presence of schools and real courts of justice, yet were not so unwilling that twenty-five thousand of these men whom we now propose to protect, the negroes, should come in and save the whites from the draft. The gentleman knows that twenty-five thousand negroes went from Kentucky in place of white men, and that those who are alive, with their families, are poor, unprotected in their rights, and mostly homeless.

And what does the gentleman now propose to mete out to this class and spare the Government the infamy of their neglect? The Kentucky Legislature has just been in session. It remained in session long enough, I am informed, to vote out every man who was elected as a Union man whom it was possible to rub out on the ground of military interference in the elections. They have, I hear, so constituted the Legislature that the traitor Breckinridge can be elected to the United States Senate sooner than an undoubted Union man could be. I suppose these facts are perfectly notorious.

Yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE] says that the laws of Kentucky are honorable, just, and suited to the condition of that State, but does not give what I waited to hear, illustrations. I charge that they are monstrous and damnable laws, such as would be a dishonor to the most barbarous nation on the face of the earth, and I regret to apply the sound political maxim that no State or nation is better than its laws. I would ask the gentleman why the Legislature of Kentucky at its late session did not change or amend those laws, so that they might show that there was honor in the Kentuckian heart, that they were willing to mete out justice to all men? As the gentleman gives me his attention, I will wait for a reply if he has one to make.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I would be happy to reply to the gentleman if it did not interfere with his remarks.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire an answer; and shall not regard it as an interference with my remarks, as I am speaking without a manuscript.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Will the gentleman repeat his question?

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman says the laws of Kentucky are honorable, just, and suited to the condition of the people of that State. I ask that gentleman why Kentucky has not repealed or amended or changed her barbarous laws?

Mr. TRIMBLE. What barbarous laws?

Mr. GRINNELL. Those against the loyal black people of the State. For instance, that law which makes it a penal offense for a man who has worn the Government uniform and fought our battles to go into that State.

Mr. TRIMBLE. As I understand, the Legislature of Kentucky is still in session. And so far as I am concerned, and I know it is the desire of every member of the party I represent in Kentucky, I desire that that State shall provide to meet the altered condition of things, and do justice to every white man and every black man in Kentucky. I can tell the gentleman the reason it has not yet been done. They have not had time; they have been in session only some three or four weeks, and matters of very great importance have been before them. But I have no doubt the Legislature will do full justice to all classes of her population; and so far as I am concerned, I am willing to do it to-day. Kentucky will not be driven.

And having answered the gentleman, I desire to say that I do not wish to have any personal dispute with him. But it would seem that his remarks could be construed into something of that kind.

Mr. GRINNELL. My questions are personal, and could not be otherwise.

Mr. TRIMBLE. And your denunciations of the State of Kentucky, were they personal?

Mr. GRINNELL. I was denouncing wrong and oppression and wickedness and crime.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Does the gentleman intend those denunciations to apply to me?

Mr. GRINNELL. Not to the gentleman, personally, but to the State that he is defending here. And not only himself, but his colleagues, who do the same here day after day.

The Legislature of Kentucky has been in session for two months, and I have it from the best authority that every Union man elected to the Kentucky Legislature that it was possible for them to turn out under any pretext they have turned out of that body. Now, let us see what are the laws of Kentucky, which are so just and honorable and equitable. And when we come to see what those laws are; and what are the rights of the white man, and that the black man has only partial rights, I think I shall be understood when I say that the writ of habeas corpus should be suspended until there is a spirit of justice exhibited by the State of Kentucky.

The white man in Kentucky can testify in the courts; the black man can testify against himself. The white man can vote; the black man cannot. The white man, if he commits an offense, is tried by a jury of his peers; the black man is tried by his enlightened, unprejudiced superiors. The rape of a negro woman by a white man is no offense; the rape of a white woman by a negro man is punishable by death, and the Governor of the State cannot commute.

A white man may come into Kentucky when he pleases; the free negro who comes there is a felon, though a discharged soldier and wounded in our battles. A white man in Kentucky may keep a gun; if a black man buys a gun he forfeits it and pays a fine of five dollars, if presuming to keep in his possession a musket which he has carried through the war. Arson of public buildings, if committed by a white man, is punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of from seven to twenty-one years; if committed by a black man the punishment is death. Arson of a warehouse, &c., when committed by a white man, is punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary from one to six years; when committed by a negro, the penalty is death.

If a white man is guilty of insurrection or rebellion he is punished by being called "chivalrous." I instance the rebel General Forrest, who murdered white men at Fort Pillow, and is reputed the most popular man South. If a negro rebels, or conspires to rebel, he is punished with death. These are specimens. Under this code sustained by public sentiment, most certainly that arch-traitor, Breckinridge, can come back to the Senate; and I apprise all the aspirants for senatorial glory in old Kentucky, who are not on that side, to "Hang up the fiddle and the bow,

Lay down the shovel and the hoe."

I do not wish to be personal, and have no pleasure in these exposures; but so long as it is asserted that this Freedmen's Bureau is a partial, unnecessary, speculating affair, I wish to call attention to the fact that in the State of Kentucky, during the last five months, more white refugees than freedmen, in the proportion of seven and one fourth to one have received rations at the hands of the Government; that this bureau has kept in schools in the State of Kentucky fourteen thousand black people; and I do not know but that is more than all the white attendants of schools in that State, out of the cities. I do not know how that may be. I only know that loyal teachers are closing their schools, while rebels are obtaining a good support, and that statute may now be enforced which imprisoned a northern lady teacher in a penitentiary many years for pointing a negro to the north star.

And here I recall an incident. Not many years ago, a fugitive from Kentucky, partly white, a young man, came to my house. After he had eaten his breakfast he looked round and saw a picture on the wall, a representation of the Saviour upon the cross. Looking at that picture, he said, "What are they doing with that fellow up there?" "Why," said I, "that is the Saviour on the cross." "The Saviour?" "Yes—Jesus." "Oh, yes, I've heard of that fellow. He's dead now, I believe." Such is the ignorance which is the result of Kentucky's laws, forming a public sentiment which led it to be the truth of history, that before the rebellion Kentucky fattened her noble Durhams for northern shambles, and bred women and children and sent them down to the slave markets of the South. Yet now, when the Government, acting in concert with the philanthropic spirit of the country, proposes to feed the refugees and freedmen in that State, it is denounced as unconstitutional, the offspring of false philanthropy. The claim of a race is denied, when

"Behold the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth."

"Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts as in the day of slaughter."

But let me press my application.

This bill is for the benefit of Kentucky and thousands in want. Your President has suspended the writ of habeas corpus there. He has been acting under his oath. Your Attorney General sanctions that suspension. The Cabinet of the United States sanctions it. This Congress believes it to be right. And what, I repeat, are you going to do with that people? I mean the refugees and colored people. They have no schools.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know when the gentleman addresses this side of the House what he means by saying, "your President."

Mr. GRINNELL. The President has been so much complimented and praised as a great and good Union man, and as the Moses who was to lead the children of Israel—

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me a word or two?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. As one on this side of the House, I desire to say that I esteem him as the President of the whole country; and I support his policy because it is calculated to restore the Union as of yore. While I had no action in electing him, yet he commands my respect and support.

Mr. GRINNELL. If this comes out of my time I must object.

The SPEAKER. It does come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. GRINNELL. The difference between the gentleman and myself is, that I had the honor to give the President my vote; and the gentleman had the honor of voting for—I have almost forgotten who—

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. A general who was in the field. I do not know whether the gentleman was there or not.

Mr. GRINNELL. That is the difference between our friendships. I gave support then, and do now. I propose to read what my friend says in regard to this head. I quote from the language of the President:

"Good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property, their right to labor, and their right to claim the just return of their labor. I cannot too strongly urge a dispassionate treatment of this subject, which should be carefully kept aloof from all party strife. We must equally avoid hasty assumptions of any natural impossibility for the two races to live side by side, in a state of mutual benefit and good-will. The experiment involves us in no inconsistency. Let us, then, go on and make that experiment in good faith, and not be too easily disheartened. The country is in need of labor, and the freedmen are in need of employment, culture, and protection. While their right of voluntary migration and expatriation is not to be questioned, I would not advise their forced removal and colonization. Let us rather encourage them to honorable and useful industry where it may be beneficial to themselves and to the country; and, instead of hasty anticipations of the certainty of failure, let there be nothing wanting to the fair trial of the experiment. The change in their condition is the substitution of labor by contract for the status of slavery. The freedman cannot fairly be accused of unwillingness to work, so long as a doubt remains about his freedom of choice in his pursuits, and the certainty of his recovering his stipulated wages. In this the interests of the employer and the employed coincide. The employer desires in his workmen spirit and alacrity, and these can be permanently secured in no other way. And if the one ought to be able to enforce the contract, so ought the other. The public interest will be best promoted if the several States will provide adequate protection and remedies for the freedmen. Until this is in some way accomplished there is no chance for the advantageous use of their labor; and the blame of ill-success will not rest on them."

"I know that sincere philanthropy is earnest for the immediate realization of its remotest aims; but time is always an element in reform. It is one of the greatest acts on record to have brought four million people into freedom. The career of free industry must be fairly opened to them; and then their future prosperity and condition must, after all, rest mainly on themselves."

If they fail, and so perish away, let us be careful that the failure shall not be attributable to any denial of justice. In all that relates to the destiny of the freedmen, we need not be too anxious to read the future; many incidents which, from a speculative point of view, might raise alarm, will quietly settle themselves."

Now, Kentucky had the opportunity of doing something for the wives and children of twenty-five thousand black soldiers raised in that State, and she failed to do it. The President now asks that they shall be protected. General Grant desires that they shall be protected. General Howard, at the head of the bureau, who has received the gentleman's praise, and who is worthy of more than he received, recommends it. He says:

"4. Education is absolutely essential to the freedmen to fit them for their new duties and responsibilities. I find many enlightened and learned men in every State advocating the necessity and wisdom of establishing a system of education. Yet I believe the majority of the white people to be utterly opposed to educating the negroes. The opposition is so great that the teachers, though they may be the purest of Christian people, are nevertheless visited, publicly and privately, with undisguised marks of odium. In many parts of the country the hostility of the white people to the schools has been undisguised, and every effort has been made to get the buildings used for school purposes away from the teachers. It is difficult to describe the odium with which the excellent self-denying school teachers are met."

Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, who is becoming so peaceful as to be praised these days by Democrats—I hope he may survive it—recommends it. He says:

"Proper provision for the colored population whose condition has been changed by direct act of the Federal Government, to serve its own purposes in the conflict, is a solemn duty. More or less resistance to the performance of this duty is to be expected while any rebellious or hostile spirit remains, but the obligation to perform it cannot be evaded or thrust aside with national honor or safety. A numerous class of white persons suffering by the ravages of war have also a just claim for relief."

Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania indorse these recommendations which down through the centuries shall be for the honor of President, war minister, and general?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. GRINNELL. Do you indorse the recommendations of General Howard, General Grant, and the President in regard to the Freedmen's Bureau?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not know exactly what those gentlemen have said. I am not going to indorse an omnium gatherum of quotations by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have read what the President, General Howard, and the Secretary of War have said.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I say that I indorse the President's policy so far as the treatment of the southern States is concerned. I believe all of his messages and public acts tend earnestly to a restoration of the Union.

Mr. GRINNELL. Do you indorse his recommendation in reference to the Freedmen's Bureau?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I shall answer in reference to the Freedmen's Bureau, when I have the opportunity, at length.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman does not find it convenient to answer at this time. I should like to have an answer before he claims to be the best and peculiar friend of the President. I should like to know where we stand. This bill is supposed to be favored by the President, the Secretary of War, General Grant, and General Howard, who are to execute it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The President of the United States does not, as I understand, recommend any such bill as this, which, according to my judgment, is in violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution. It proposes to appropriate money without any color of law.

Mr. GRINNELL. And I state that to my knowledge, as informed, the President of the United States does indorse the substance of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call upon the gentleman to state where and when the President has given his indorsement to this bill.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am very much in the condition of another gentleman here the other day; I am not at liberty to disclose the secrets of the President, if I had any.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. As we cannot take what is in the gentleman's mind, we must remain in the dark.

Mr. GRINNELL. If the gentleman doubts my assertion—

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not doubt his word, but I want the whole House to be as much enlightened as the gentleman himself.

Mr. GRINNELL. It is said that this is a partial bill, and I have this to say in regard to the objection: that during the administration of General Fisk, in the district of Tennessee and Kentucky, seven and a quarter greater supplies were meted out to the white people under his bureau than to the colored freedmen. It is to reach those in want, the white mountain refugee and the ex-colored soldier and slave, with his family; and I cannot conceive that any gentleman who has the honor of his country at heart, who believes in the emancipation proclamation, and that under the Constitution we are authorized to enact the laws that are necessary to carry out its provisions, can object to feeding and clothing the naked and ministering in hospitals to those who have been true to our flag and shed their blood in our cause.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRINNELL. I cannot, as I hasten to submit a few items. This bureau is in charge of 800,000 acres of land, and 1,500 pieces of town property. It has issued more than 600,000 rations to refugees, and 3,500,000 to freedmen. It has treated 2,500 refugees in hospitals and decently buried 227 of them. It has treated 45,000 freedmen and made the graves for 6,000 of the number. Transportation has been furnished to 1,700 refugees and 1,900 freedmen. In the schools there are 80,000 people that have been instructed by this bureau. And now it is proposed to leave all these children of misfortune to the tender mercies of a people of whom it is true by the Spanish maxim, "Since I have wronged you I have hated you." I never can. Our authority to take care of them is founded in the Constitution; else it is not worthy to be our great charter. It gives authority to feed Indian tribes, though our enemies, and a just interpretation cannot restrain us in clothing and feeding unfortunate friends. In providing schools we can turn to the same authority which led to the gift of millions of acres of the public domain for the purpose of establishing agricultural colleges in this country.

These possessory titles under General Sherman's order to lands on the Sea Islands give constitutional gentleman great concern; but should they? Were not the lands abandoned, and had not those who followed General Sherman's army need of a home? There appeared gentlemen with a suaviter in modo, and set up that the negro was a disturbing force, and they wished him to "contract" or to remove where he might enjoy a forty-acre tract of land in Florida, and give up their possessory titles. I heard these gentlemen's plausible and earnest arguments for the recovery of millions' worth of lands forfeited, and I heard but one negro, an ex-slave, upon the same subject, and I am constrained to say that the simple honesty of the ex-slave was more persuasive than the suaviter of the ex-slaveholders and their advocates, who abjure as a punishment for rebels confiscation and the use of hemp.

Those lands by the sea, abandoned, were moistened with the sweat and blood of those who toiled there, patiently waiting for the year of jubilee: and when asked to restore them by an act of Congress I answer, I never will be a party to any such injustice. I believe it is the Christian duty of this Government, as it has been the duty of the various philanthropic societies and religious associations, to take care of these people. At the homes of the sons of the pilgrims on our remotest prairies contributions are made for the refugees and freedmen, and the Society of Friends, who have gauged the dimensions of these suffering people, hid among the mountains in camps and hospitals, have set us an example of fidelity. They could not take up arms with a good conscience, yet they were the first in the hospitals and the longest there, refusing to receive compensation, munificent in their quiet charities; and now they come to us from Maryland, and all our States, asking protection for their agents and schools. Their school-houses have been burned since the sitting of this Congress, and so near to us that the very flames of the conflagration might have lighted up this Capitol. These are a few lines of their memorial:

"In Maryland, where emancipation was effected by statute law some time before the President's proclamation, about forty schools were established by the 'Maryland Association for the Moral and Intellectual Improvement of the Colored People' of that State. Of these about one fourth have been, within a few months, broken up; meeting and school-houses have been burned, and teachers assaulted and driven away. In the States recently in rebellion, they are subject to wrongs and outrages from which they have no redress under existing laws, which were made to subserve the system of slavery. Your memorialists therefore submit, that, as the Government, 'for its own purposes,' changed their condition and deprived them of the care incident to it, and upon which they depended, it has become bound, by every consideration of justice and honor, to assume their guardianship and to prevent them from suffering by the change. We are glad to see the subject so forcibly urged upon Congress both by the President and Secretary of War. In the opinion of your memorialists this solemn duty will not be accomplished by the mere adoption of the late amendment to the Constitution, which provides for the legal abolition of slavery. Much of the real and personal property in the parts of the country in which these 'wards' of the Government live, is, by reason of the rebellion, subject to forfeiture, and the lives of many persons to the penalties of treason. And if it be desirable to restore this property to those who have incurred its forfeiture, and proclaim a general amnesty on their behalf, it is not less desirable to fulfill the obligations of the Government toward the people who were their slaves, and whose unrequited toil accumulated much of that property."

Mr. Speaker, there is to-day devolved upon us—I care not who decries it; I will not evade it—a high, solemn, and religious duty. We should be worse than barbarians to leave these people where they are, landless, poor, unprotected; and I commend to gentlemen who still cling to the delusion that all is well to take lessons of the Czar of the Russias, who, when he enfranchised his people, gave them lands and school-houses, and invited schoolmasters from all the world to come there and instruct them. Let us hush our national songs; rather gird on sack-cloth, if wanting in moral courage to reap the fruits of our war by being just and considerate to those who look up to us for temporary counsel and protection. Care and education are cheaper for the nation than neglect, and nothing is plainer in the counsels of Heaven, or the world's history:

"There is the moral of all human tales:
'Tis but the same rehearsal of the past.
First freedom, and then glory; when that fails,
Wealth, vice, corruption—barbarism at last.
And history, with all her volumes vast,
Hath but one page."

This discussion is not plainly promotive of the most commendable temper. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] declared on Saturday as I caught his language that if he were arrested on the complaint of a negro and brought before one of the agents of this bureau, when he became free he would shoot him. Is that civilization? It is the spirit of barbarism, that has too long dwelt in our land, the spirit of infernal regions that brought on the rebellion and this war.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. GRINNELL. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH. I do not want to ask a question; I merely wish to make a remark.

Mr. GRINNELL. I decline to yield unless for a question.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. ROUSSEAU] does not belong to that class of men that the gentleman from Iowa speaks of. He served in the Union cause four years during the war.

Mr. GRINNELL. History repeats itself. I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the other side; but I say that he degraded his State and uttered a sentiment I thought unworthy of an American officer when he said that he would do such an act on the complaint of a negro against him.

Mr. SMITH. I deny that my colleague made any such statement.

Mr. GRINNELL. I occupied the Speaker's chair when the gentleman's colleague was speaking, and I heard the words; but the gentleman has seen fit, like other gentlemen, to withhold his speech for revision, and I cannot, therefore, refer to it. I have no desire to do him the least injustice or impugn his honor.

Mr. SMITH. I will only say that my colleague did not say so.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am casting no reflection on the gentleman's colleague at all; but cannot forbear remarking that it would seem more becoming gentlemen who represent the State of the "great Commoner," who spoke in these Halls forty years ago, to have imbibed his spirit and principles evinced in a desire that slavery should die in his State by a constitutional limitation, rather than that manifested by the gentleman from the Ashland district, who did not believe in the proclamation of emancipation or in the disturbance of slavery. He did not like the educational and able speech of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] and meant no compliments to us "so far north that we got a little sunshine, and where was yet the track of the buffalo and the Indian." True, ours is not the "sunny South," but a land of free schools and industrious habits, of requited labor; and we have proffered you nothing but kindness. The southern country cannot be regenerated without organized labor. Her people are crowded in towns, or roving from plantation to plantation, and require such directing minds as this bureau will furnish that early contracts may be made and there be found the comforts of home. There is a demand for that crop of three million bales of cotton, from which we can raise a hundred millions of revenue. If there is no quiet for the laborer, justice in enforcing contracts, and schools for the young, now thirsting for knowledge, the crop will not be raised, and suffering follows. Interest, honor, and humanity, then, are alike involved in carrying out the provisions of this freedman's bill.

I am ready to yield my preferences and cooperate with all sections, knowing that we rise or fall together in national character. I would have nothing partial or sectional, nor by a word or act hinder a State in the march to the noble position which her generosity or heroism may give title. To even that State which is so willing to receive a nation's dispensations to her poor, I would give a proud and commanding position among our Commonwealths.

I now, to show my regard for a gallant gentleman, yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKEE.]

The SPEAKER. There are fifteen minutes left of the time of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKEE] will be allowed the five minutes that were taken out of my time by interruptions.

Mr. ELIOT. I object to that. I will give the gentleman five or ten minutes of the time to which I shall be entitled after the previous question shall have been ordered.

Mr. McKEE. I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to allow this discussion to close without a remark from me in regard to this bill. But as my own State has come in for such a large share in this discussion, and has taken such a large share of the opposition to this bill, I have felt it to be a duty which I owe not only to myself but to the loyal people I represent upon this floor, that I should say a few words in reply to what I have heard urged here in opposition to this bill. I do not propose to wander from the bill, or to discuss anything outside of the bill, but to answer some of the objections made to it by my colleagues and other gentlemen upon this floor.

Now, sir, who have made objections to this bill? Who are the men who interpose objections to its passage? First, you find all those in this House who during the great struggle just closed have opposed every measure for crushing out treason. Again, you find outside of these Halls all that class of people who for the last four years we have been disposed to denominate as traitors—they are opposing this bill. They are calling out that this is a usurpation; they are denouncing it as a monstrous usurpation; they are telling us that it interferes with their rights. The same class of men who have opposed every act of the Administration proposed during the last four eventful years, set on foot and carried on to crush out a great conspiracy. In the main, these are the fierce and bitter opponents of this measure.

Now, what do we need to dispose of their objections? They tell us they have submitted to the laws; that they have accepted the results of the war; that they have taken the oath of allegiance to the Government required of them. And each one of those men, with that oath of allegiance sticking down in their breeches pocket, sworn to support the policy of the Government, now come up here and stand out against every single iota of that policy which they have held up their hands in presence of the Almighty and sworn to support. From that class of men comes the opposition to this bill almost wholly. And why do they oppose it? Simply because it interferes with that course which they have so long pursued; simply because it prevents them from exercising that tyrannical power which from the foundation of our Government they have been accustomed to use over one portion of the human race. They desire to continue that tyranny; they desire to continue that oppression; they desire to continue that wrong. And when this House and this Congress and this nation propose to protect all its people alike, then it is they come in here in opposition to such a course. Do you find those who sustained this war opposed to this bill? Do you find that great party of the Union who throughout the grand struggle stood up for the flag lifting their voices up against this bill? No, sir; with few exceptions, and may God help those who have strayed away, the great party who stood by the country in the death-grapple with treason, in which treason died and the nation survived, stands to-day for the completion of the work which four years of war carried so grandly on.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House are accustomed to say this is a monstrous usurpation. Why, sir, we have heard that talk for more than four years here. What bill has been introduced into and passed by Congress since the time this war began that this same party has not been accustomed to denounce as a monstrous usurpation of power? When the President of the United States issued his call for troops they cried out, "A monstrous usurpation of power." When he sent a requisition to the Governor of my own State, what was the response? "Not a man, not a dollar, to prosecute this wicked war against our southern brethren." And the Union party, God help them! in Kentucky, indorsed the sentiment at that day. I did not belong to that part of the Union party; I never belonged to that "neutrality concern." I never put in my oar to help propel that ship which was in favor of thundering forth with its cannon against the North and the South alike. I never belonged to that party which said, "We will stand as a wall of fire against either side." I thank God I never stood upon but one side, and that was the side of my country, against treason, against oppression, against wrong in all its forms.

And here I would say a word to those gentlemen who say that the course of the Government through its military satraps destroyed the Union party in Kentucky.

Mr. Speaker, the Union party in the State of Kentucky ruined themselves, because from the time the first gun was sounded they failed to come up to the mark and stand out for the right. There was the difficulty. Had the Union men of Kentucky in 1861 taken bold ground in favor of coercion and against treason, though we might have had a small party at that day, we would have had a great party to back us, the Government of the United States, which would have thrown its troops into the State of Kentucky, and we would have been saved from the evils that rolled over us after that time; and to-day we would have stood forth in our courage and strength the great party of the State; and instead of fawning at the feet of traitors, and not daring to brook their insults, they would have lain prostrate at our feet. Loyalty would have commanded a premium in the State, and treason held itself with a modesty it would certainly become its guilty actors everywhere to wear.

Gentlemen say that there is no need of this bureau; that we do not want it because peace has returned to our land. If we have peace to-day, why is it that the President of the United States keeps our armies in the field in the southern States? Why is it that all that rebellious country is laid off into military districts, with a military commander for each department? Why is it that martial law is in force there, and the habeas corpus is suspended? What says the Lieutenant General of the United States on this subject of peace? In a communication to the President of the United States, dated December 18, 1865, after an extensive tour—extensive in the distance traveled over, but very short in time—he said:

"I did not meet any one, either those holding places under the Government or citizens of the southern States, who think it practicable to withdraw the military from the South at present. The white and the black mutually require the protection of the General Government."

Does that look as if peace prevailed throughout the land? I think that the statements of the Lieutenant General flatly contradict those of gentlemen upon the other side of this House.

It is said, again, that there is no need of this bureau. What says the same high authority? I read from the same paper:

"In some form the Freedmen's Bureau is an absolute necessity until civil law is established and enforced, securing to the freedmen their rights and full protection."

Has any southern State given the freedmen "their full rights and full protection?" Is there a solitary State of those that have been in rebellion, (and I include my own State with the rest, because, although she has never been, by proclamation, declared a State in rebellion, I think she has been one of the most rebellious of the whole crew,) is there a single one of these States that has passed laws to give the freedmen full protection? In vain we wait an affirmative response. Until these States have done so, says this high authority, the Freedmen's Bureau is a necessity. This is to my mind a sufficient answer to the arguments of gentlemen on the other side. In none of those States has the black man a law to protect him in his rights, either of person or property. He can sue in a court of justice in my State, but he can command no testimony in his prosecution or defense unless the witness be a white man. We have one code for the white man, another for the black. Is this justice? Where is your court of justice in any southern State where the black man can secure protection? Again there is no response.

But gentlemen say that this war was waged for the purpose of preserving the Union, and that now at the end of the war the policy seems to be to perpetuate the Republican party. Now, sir, this war was waged for the Union; it was waged by the Republican party for the Union. Now, at the end of the war, when we have crushed out armed treason in the field, do the gentlemen who opposed this war desire this great Republican party now to put the Government into the hands of those whom they have crushed? What loyal man desires that traitors again resume the helm of state? I desire to see the Government continued in the hands of loyal men who stood under their flag and fought against treason and traitors everywhere. I desire now, and in all time to come, to see the men who went forth to battle in defense of right, to sustain the Government handed down to us by our fathers, aided by their friends who sustained them in that effort, direct all our affairs for themselves, for their children, and for generations yet unborn.

Again, we have heard the same old cry which men who sat here in 1860 and 1861 heard then: "You may pass odious laws, but you never can enforce them." Well, we will try that proposition with the gentlemen who make it. I believe we can. I believe we are more powerful to-day than we were then; and if this people desire to get up another revolt, the quicker they go at it the better for us. We will sweep them out in the future as we have in the past, and the next blast will be like the simoom of the desert, so terrible that its opponents will never dare rise again. But I pray for better things; I pray God these men may return to reason, and accept the situation in the sense in which it was tendered by that great and good man, as he held out the oath which they so greedily devoured; that they will learn to know that they have committed a crime and that it is a mercy to them, and the lightest punishment for treason, that they cannot rule again.

No warrant in the Constitution for this law! None! I make the same response to that I have to the assumptions of gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. They have been proclaiming all the time we have had no warrant for anything we have done. They have said there was no authority in the President to appoint provisional governors for the rebel States. Yet they come here as champions for the President and his policy.

We are told that abuses may arise under this bureau; that it is intrusting too much power in the Secretary of War and the officers who are appointed under it. I think gentlemen, professing as they do to have ample confidence in the President and his Administration, need not fear that they will transcend their authority. It shows a lack of faith. I am not afraid of them.

Moreover, we are told that abuses will occur of men under the bureau. I suppose there never has been a law enacted since the time the Lord of heaven handed down the ten commandments to Moses upon Mount Sinai that has not been abused; but I have yet to learn that the abuse of a law justifies its repeal or non-enactment. These things can be corrected as one of my colleagues [Mr. ROUSSEAU] showed in a speech in opposition to the bill could be done in his own city. I have no doubt they can be corrected everywhere else.

They have told us this is a bill to humiliate the South, to humiliate that "brave and chivalric people," to lower their dignity if you choose! My own opinion about that is that it needs to be brought down. [Laughter.] This war has failed so far to bring that chivalry down as low as it ought to be brought to make them obedient to the law as good citizens, and to extend the right of protection to all men. We need something more to humiliate them.

Is it humiliation to that people to be brought under the same laws by which we are bound? We do not ask them to submit to anything that we are not willing to be bound by. Is that humiliation? To the proud and chivalric sons of the South it may be. To the Virginia and South Carolina slaveocracy perhaps it is. But they must learn that they lord it over their hundred slaves no longer.

A war of subjugation, say gentlemen, for the purpose of imposing terms upon these people. They have told you that in this House in 1861, after the battle of Bull Run, a resolution was passed in which we said to the world this was not a war of conquest and subjugation. I do not know, I have sometimes doubted if I had been a member at that time I would have voted for the resolution, for I have always held it was a war of subjugation, a war to subjugate an armed power opposed to the Government of the United States, a war to subjugate armed treason and bring armed traitors back to an allegiance to the laws of the land.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am told Kentucky does not want that law. I do not know; I believe that Kentucky sent into the field twenty-seven thousand soldiers of the colored race. They have been returned to their homes by the order of the Secretary of War, approved by the President, and they are allowed to retain their arms. I suppose those men, who are now freedmen, would like to have this law to protect them. There is one class who want this law. There is another class who want this law. They are the men who stood by this country during the great struggle, and do not want the country overrun by armed traitors who waged war against us.

My colleague from the first district [Mr. TRIMBLE] has said that Kentucky's slain lie upon every battle-field of the Republic. So they do, Mr. Speaker; and I regret that, as a loyal man, I must make the humiliating acknowledgment that Kentucky's traitors lie there, too.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one way Kentucky can yet get rid of the operations of this law; there is one way all the States from Kentucky to the Rio Grande can get rid of this law and all its abuses at the same time. Let them pass laws and enforce them in the courts giving to all men the same privileges to protection in civil tribunals.

Until that is done we need the law. We need it to restrain those men who stood out against their country, to protect the loyal of all colors. Having engaged in this great work, having crushed out the greatest conspiracy the world has ever seen, having swept the conspirators off from every position, it is our duty now to protect these men whom we have emancipated and made freemen in our land. And as a humble Representative of the State of Kentucky on this floor, as one claiming to have always stood by my country, I stand here to-day still contending for justice, for principle, for right. These people have been emancipated as one of the natural results of this war—a war forced upon the loyal people of the land by traitors. They can never be reenslaved. As freedmen they must have the civil rights of freemen.

Let the States in which they live pass such laws for their protection as will give them the same rights in their courts of justice that other men have. Give to them the right to protect themselves and there will no longer be any need of such a law as this. The time has gone by—yes, and I thank God it can never return—when a human being in this Republic because of his color can be treated as a brute; when the brutal master can have law to protect him in his crime. And now, when the great mad scheme to overturn and destroy the Republic has failed, when treason has been crushed, when a million men who have gone forth to battle have returned to their homes, men scarred upon a hundred battle-fields, must we say to this million men to-day, "All your efforts have been in vain?" Shall we say to the more than three hundred thousand men who have gone down to their graves on the bloody battle-fields, "Your lives have been offered up as a sacrifice for your country, and all in vain?"

Shall we say to the sixty thousand martyrs—victims to a cruelty more barbarous, deep, damning, and devilish than the world has ever seen, who went down to their graves starved in rebel prison pens—shall we say to those brave martyrs and to their widows and little ones at home, "Your graves are ruled over to-day by the same men that looked up to heaven and thanked God, while they had you in their power, that they had it thus in hand to see the 'Yankees die?'" Let us say to the widow and orphan of the brave soldier who, with his last dying gaze, as he lay starving in those horrid dens of iniquity, looked up to heaven, and his soul went to God as he thought of the loved ones at home, "The brave man perished a martyr to liberty, and as his redeemed spirit looks out through the windows of heaven it beholds a land redeemed, disenthralled, and free." No, Mr. Speaker, let us proclaim to the world and let it go forth that, having conquered the rebellion, having subdued the rebel army, we are prepared to rule this land and make our people free. And when that proud old bird of freedom shall soar across the land, bearing in his beak the broad banner of beauty and glory, let all its stars unfold to the world proclaim in a language which will make thrones and tyrannies tremble to their centers, "This is the home of the free!" [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again remind gentlemen of the House of Representatives that they have adopted a rule prohibiting applause in the galleries, and that they must enforce that rule themselves.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill entitled, "An act (H. R. No. 36) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1867, and additional appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1866;" when the Speaker signed the same.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] before he calls the previous question, will withdraw his motion to recommit, which now cuts off amendment, as I understand it, until I can offer an amendment to the committee's amendment to this bill, which will leave it more acceptable to me.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot do so at this moment.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to offer an amendment to the bill at this time.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot.

Mr. SMITH. Then allow me to make a remark at this moment.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield just now.

Mr. SMITH. I am sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is not disposed to be as courteous to me as he has been to other gentlemen upon this floor.

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to withdraw the motion I made to recommit this bill; and then, by instruction of the select committee on the Freedmen's Bureau, I wish also to withdraw the substitute which has been reported from the committee, and to offer another substitute in lieu thereof, which I will proceed to explain.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] falls with the withdrawal of the substitute first reported by the committee.

Mr. ELIOT. I have promised my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to allow him to offer his amendment to this substitute, as he did to the one I have just withdrawn.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move to amend by inserting after the word "schools," in section six, the following:

And the Commissioner may provide a common-school education for all refugees or freedmen who shall apply therefor.

Mr. STEVENS. Can I offer a substitute for the one reported by the committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has already proposed an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] withdraw his amendment so as to give me an opportunity to offer my substitute for the one reported from the committee?

Mr. DONNELLY. If my amendment is withdrawn now, will I again have an opportunity to offer it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] proposes to call the previous question. If that call is sustained the gentleman will have no opportunity to offer his amendment.

Mr. DONNELLY. Then I must decline to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I will proceed now to explain the changes proposed by the select committee in the substitute now reported, from the one reported from that committee the other day.

The first alteration they propose to make is in the first section. As it now stands the President may divide the section of country containing refugees and freedmen into districts not exceeding twelve in number, each containing one or more States. The committee propose to amend the section by inserting after the words "section of country" the words "within which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is at present suspended," so that it will then read, "and the President may divide the section of country within which the writ of habeas corpus is at present suspended, containing such refugees and freedmen, into districts;" &c.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] permit me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. ELIOT. If the gentleman thinks it important to interrupt me for the purpose of putting a question, I cannot object.
